Don't Let Anything Keep You Away

As the canoe slipped out of the dense gloom of the ship's shadow, Elsie heard the wrathful chief officer interviewing the Chilean sailors on watch on the main deck fore and aft. That is to say, he stirned them up from the bridge with a ritual laid down for such extreme cases. Not yet had he realized the exceeding artifice which the girl displayed in throwing him and all the others off their guard. She had manoeuvered Suarez into the canoe with the fierce and silent strategy of a Red Indian. The Argentine squatted on his knees in the bows, Gray placed himself amidships, and Elsie sat aft, holding the revolver in her right hand and the dog's collar in her left. The American groped for and found a paddle, which he plied vigorously. "Guess you'd better discourse," said he over his shoulder, when the light craft was well clear of the ship. "You understand Spanish, I think?" "Yes." "Please tell Suarez to cease paddling and listen. Don't move. I can trust you, but I may have to shoot him."	the retreat where she believed that her slover and many of his men were hidden. If a squad of Indians mounted guard there, the reappearance of Suarez in his war paint, backed by the alarm of a night attack from the sea, might mystify the enemy sufficiently to permit of a landing, while the frequent reports of the revolver would certainly lead to a counter demonstration by Courtenay. Suarez was the only man on the Kansas who could act as guide, and the penalty of his refusal would be instant death. She had provided a strong, sharp knife to cut the thongs which fastened the canoes to their anchorstones. For the rest, she trusted to the darkness. It was her fixed resolve to succeed or die. Gray listened to the girl's cool state front with growing admiration. The she within the bounds of reason. The odds were against it, of course, but the law of probability is seldom in favor of a forlorn hope. Suarez, too, making the best of a situation which gave him no option, agreed that they had a fair chance if once they got hold of the canoes. Nevertheless, he warned them that he knew	heat the shortened draped waist, with hemisette of tucked white net and lace hat this device would effectually stop him rom barking, but Elsie thought he would or resent the indignity that he might payers heed to outer circumstances. She leeded no warning that Indians were near. The Argentine miner's description of the ommunity which dwelt on Otter Creek ande her understand that there were handreds within hail. A great joy leaped up in her when the inst canoe came under her hand. It was nuite easy to manipulate the painter-rope. The stem had a notched knob provided or this very purpose, and there was a tern-post against which a steersman night press a paddle and thus swerve the lance in any direction. But it was slow work. The craft were moored without my semblance of order, yet Suarez was forced to secure them in definite sequence, or a string of half-a-dozen would become immanageable. When the second canoe was made fast Gray bent towards the girl once more.	there is a jabot of lace with sink tasted cords, which hangs below the belt line. Guanaco Hill was directly astern of the ship; they had absolutely no trouble in maintaining a straight line for their destination, all that was necessary being to keep the mast-head light in the exact centre of the green and red points. well. The gentleman in India scannel have a wholesome respect for you already; anything you say goes, where he is concerned. I am taking your word for it his name is Suarez, but he looks, and smells, more like an Indian." "I forced him to dress in his discarded clothes. He may be able now to scare any of the savages we come across. But why should I give you my weapon, Mr. Gray?" "Because I can hit most things I aim	hill. He believed there were no reefs on that side of the inlet, but he never visited it. Their greatest peril lay amid the almost impenetrable trees which grew down to the water's edge. On his advice, Gray unshipped the mast and threw it overboard. Then silence became imperative. If aught were said, they must speak in the merest whisper. The canoe darted forward again with stealthy haste. The night was clear, though dark. The stars helped them to	watch, he breathed against the con- preckon it has taken ten minutes to col- lect two dug outs. Unless we mean to re- main all night we must let up on the cut- ting adrift proposition." "I agree, she murmured. "But we must have two more." He told Suarez of the new development, which was essential, though it added to the danger of the enterprise. By sheer good fortune, however, they blundered against the life-boat. A dog barked, and Elsie had a thrilling struggle with Joey, who was funious that this unlooked-for in-	Let, King street. Those present were O. H. Warwiek, who presided; J. Harvey Brown, R. T. "Do you pledge your word to go on with my scheme?" "That is what I am here for." "Take the revolver, then." "Sure it's loaded?" "Quite sure. I have fifteen extra cart- ridges, but, as I have practised refilling it in the dark, give it to me if you have oc- casion to empty it." "You seem to have thought this thing out pretty fully?" "I intend to succeed. Now please, I must explain what I want Suarez to do. Speaking in Spanish, low, and clear while the canoe drifted steadily up the bay with the rising tide, Elsie unfolded her project. Behind the guardian elif of Otter Creek a ridge of rocks created of small natural harbor. It was the custom of the Alsculofs, when the weather was calm, and they meant to use their craf at daybreak, to anchor most of their ves sel in this sheltered break-water. At oth er times the canoes were drawn ashore but she reasoned that such a precaution would not be taken during the presen excitement. That was the first part o her programme—to capture the entir fleet, including the life-boat. In any	coming rapidly nearer. As they crept round the southern cheek of Point Kansas, the Argentine ceased paddling, and placed a warning hand on Gray's arm. The cliff was so high and steep that its shadow plunged into deepest gloom the water at its base. Suarez, however, had imbibed a good deal of savage lore during his enforced residence on the island. He stretched well for ward over the bows, held a paddle as far in front as possible, and thus not only guided the drifting canoe by an occasional dip of the blade, but trusted it for warning of any unseen rock. There was a cold breeze on the surface of the bay, but the dog was the only, one who shivered, and his tremors arose from excitement. At last they felt a slight bump. The Argentine had found the reef he was searching for; by watching a star it was easy enough to follow the southerly bend taken by the canoe in skirting this barrier, while their ears caught the murmur of the swift current amid the numerous tiny channels of the rocks. Suddenly this swirl and hum of fast flowing water ceased. Elsie and Gray became aware that Suarez was cautiously drawing himself inboard again. Then his paddle dipped with a noiseless stroke; the canoe was inside the Alaculof harbor. The midnight blackness was now something that had a sense of actual obstruction in it. It seemed that a hand put	solence should go unanswered. The sleep- less cur who yelped ashore speedily sub- sided, but it appeared to be an age before Suarez moved again. He knew, better than his companions, how ready the In- dians were to note such sentinel challen- ges. Had the alarm continued, the whole village would have been aroused, and, it the attack on the canoes were suspected, the water might swarm with vengeful savages. Elsie found the painter of the life-boat coiled in its proper place. Soon she ex- perienced a steady pull on the rope. Her little fleet was in motion. Gray began the help in the paddling. Ere long they came under the influence of the tide, and she heard the ripple of the water against the planks of the boat. Then Suarez called a halt and a parley. It would be far better, he advised, to use the oars in the heavy boat than at tempt to tow it across the current from a canoe. They would gain time and be safer. So they climbed into the life-boat but continued to tow the canoes. And now they saw the mast-head ligh of the Kansas. Boyle had also caused the side lights to be slung to davits, and the white, red and green lamps made triangle in the obscurity, though its bas seemed to be strangely near sea level Even a big vessel like the Kansas shrink to small proportions when she is a mil or more distant at night. She become indivisible, a mere atom in the immensit.	as last year, and if found correct entered on the minutes. This was agreed to. Mr. Fisher thought that the auditors, besides inspecting the accounts, ought also to examine the books of the institution. The books, he said, ought to include a cash book and ledger. In the cash book the running expenses ought to be kept under appropriate headings, while the ledger might show interest accounts and bonded debts of the institution. Mr. Hayes explained that he already has a cash book and ledger. The accounts in the former, he said, might be divided up a little more, and he would be glad of any hints that would be useful to him. The chairman said that in his work for the Protestant Orphan Asylum he keeps a cash book and a ledger. Except in isolated cases he said he never gets an itemized account for maintenance at the end of the month. He merely gets a memorandum of the amount, for which he gives a check and then he enters the transaction in the cash book. Mr. Brown explained that a great deal of the business of the School for the Deaf had fallen on his shoulders since its commencement, including much of the buying. It was easy to keep track of the groceries, he said, but such provisions as butter, eggs and meat were bought in the open market in which cases no bills or receipts were given. All these items, however, were entered in a pass book, which was accessible to the auditors. Owing to the	responsible and desirable people who pay for the privilege of reading them. No other medicine in the world is so widely known and so highly	the narrow-beamed Fuegian craft she was in would only hold four more occupants, and that with a certain risk and unwieldiness. She was as determined as ever to cross the bay and endeavor to communicate with the imprisoned men. But she recognized the absurdity ity of the thought that Courtenay and Tollemache would consent to escape in the canoes and leave the others to their fate, even if such a thing were practicable. Oddly enough, the one person whose daring might reasonably be suspected, gave no signs of the pangs of doubt. Suarez pushed forward resolutely. He knew what Elsie had forgotten—that in each canoe used by the Indians there was a carefully prepared fire, whose charcoal embers retained some heat and glow all night. The first intimation of this fact was revealed by the pungent fumes which environed	the throat or lungs, or both, affected. Dr Wood's Norway Pine Syrup is the medicin you need.
