erally Supposed --- Elections in the Old Days.

HOW DUNDONALD FOOLED ELECTORATE

Though Britiah public life is notor lously free from corruption, and though the present elections are being decided, probably, without the lillicit expenditure of a thousand pounds, in the olden days they had bribery down to rather a fine art in dear old England. Even the noblest men in public life did not hesitate to spend money freely in their efforts to win a seat in parliament. William Wilberforce, the champion of the freedom of the slaves, admits in his memoirs that he pald the electors of Hull £3,000 to send him to Westminster. There were laws then against bribery and their letter was not broken, since the money was not paid to the elector until the last day on which election petitions could be presented.

The Market Price of Votes.

"By long established custom," writes Wilberforce, "the single vote of a resident elector was rewarded by a donation of two guineas; four were paid for a plumper, and the expenses of a freeman's journey from London averaged £10 apiece." It is told of the grandfather of the present Earl of Dundonald, say; the form one occasion he fooled the corrupt electorate in a very neat manner. He spent practically no money in his election, and was soundly beatend only a small percentage of the electors voting for him. After the elector was over he summoned every supporter and told him that, while he was an opponent of bribery, he believed that good men should be rewarded for their votes, so long as the operation could be conducted in such a manner that no suspicion could a rise that the payment was intended to influence them.

Lent no Support.

The Viceroy lent no support in the faction desirious of following in the wake of Turkey and Persia, but declared emphatically that representative government in the Western senso was totally inapplicable to the Indian empire. He dwelt at length upon "the anarchy, and lawlessness which are seeking to subvert not only British rule but the governments of the Indian chiefe," and while admitting that "much of the existing political discontent is thoroughly justifiable" declared that the "British administration will no longer tolerate the preachings of the revolutionary press and is now determined to bridle literary license."

To Help Natives.

For more than three years the imperial government and the Indian administration under Lord Morley, have wrestled, with the details of a plan designed to admit the natives to an important share in the legislation of the portant share in the legislation of the country.

Under the new arrangement the Viceroy Council has 370 instead of 126, as formerly, or whom a total of 135 will be elected, as against thirty-nine elected heretofore. The functions of the Council are enlarged and it will be enabled to take an active part in budget construction and new legislation. All religious and special interests may elect representatives to the Viceroy's and provincial councils, though any candidate may be disqualified by the imperial and provincial governments if they hold that his election would be contrary to public interests.

There remain, as before, eight councils, namely, the imperial, or Viceroy's and one each for Bengal, Madraz, Bombay, the United Provinces, the Punjab, Burmah and Eastern Benga and Assan. In the Imperial Council officials of the Indian service have a majority of three, while in the others non-official members are in the majority.
