rightly called the "Flowery Kingdom," Hydrangeas grew wild upon the mountains, and hundreds of wildflowers of most beautiful species, including magnificent lilies, were to be found there.
The Japanese were fond of these natural beauties, and one of the subjects of the school curriculum was flower arrangement. Their manner of arranging flowers would strike a foreigner as strange, but it was a pleasing one. The humblest home had its little space for flowers, and the gardens were beautiful. The Japanese had a high sense of art, and this was not confined to horticulture, but to all kinds of the fine arts. Their literature was lacking, al though the better class had much of the poetic nature, and their music was limited to their own individual kind. However, in fine handiwork and painting they could not be excelled. Miss Archer mentioned especially the embroidery work of the women, which was superior to her previous highest Miss Archer said she thought this was the most important time of Japan's career, from a missionary standpoint Many were of the opinion that Japan's growth as a great nation now depended upon Christianity.
