ONE CENT MORNING PAPER,

THE TRUE SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEM.

From The Week of March 27, 1884.

A few months ago financial circles in England were somewhat stirred by the publication of two or three papers by Mr Goschen, M.P., on the appreciation of gold. In these papers he endeavored to show, first—that during a number of years past prices of staple commodities generally had been falling; and, next—that scarcity of fold was the bottom cause of the apparent decline in commodities. It was not so much that articles of merchandise were getting cheaper as that gold, relatively to all other things, was setting scarcer and dearer. The demonstization of silver in Germany, and the establishment of a gold standard there, had been a most pronounced and particular factor in aggravating an evil which had been developing elsewhere and from other causes. Silver had been discredited as money, at the same time that the production of gold had fallen off not only relatively but absolutely. There had been an actual shrinkage in the amount of standard coin available for the world's exchanges, alongside of an enormous expansion of the world's whole traffic in buying and selling. At the very time when a large increase of coinage of the precious metals was wanted to accommodate the world's expanding commerce, the withdrawal of silver from circulation and its consequent fall in price had caused a tremendous shrinkage instead. And it was argued that the world's growing needs from circulation and its consequent fall in price had caused a tremendous shrinkage instead. And it was argued that the world's growing needs could be met only by devising some means of bringing silver back to its old place as a medium of exchange and standard of value. The world's whole supply of gold being miserably insufficient for the requirements of commerce, it was imperatively necessary that silver be brought into use to make up the deficiency.

In other words Mr. Goschen proclaimed himself a bi-metallist—an advocate of both gold and silver as standards of values. Of course The Economist and other organs of the gold money school were "down" on him immediately, and many links of statistics long drawn out were used to show that he was wrong in his facts, and that no general fall in prices of commodities, such as he affirmed, had taken place. Some of the organs referred to said boldly and bluntly that, as England was a creditor nation, it was her interest to keep money scarce and prices of commodities low, and that that should be the end of arce and prices of commodities and that that should be the end and that that should be the one and that that should be the one it, as far as she was concerned. Admitting this to tell in favor of the single gold standard in England, it evidently tells against it everywhere else in the world, from North America to Australia, and from China to Peru.

But Mr. Goschen, who ranks high among financial authorities in England, is not easily put down, and of ate many letters sustaining his tion have been published in the tion have been published in the London papers. Among them is one from Mr. H. R. Grenfell, an ex-governor of the Bank of England, and The Economist, it must be said, does not appear particularly strong in reply. The subject is now before the public, and England's vast interest in India, where sliver is the standard gives it a pracsilver is the standard, gives it a prac-
