A BLACK SILK DRESS

Sight of it Stirrs the Heart of a Houston Editor

When the new officers returned to New Orleans from Fort Logan H. Root the other day there was a throng of outstretched loving arms to receive them, and this little scene appeared in the report of the New Orleans States.
"Unable to repress herself, one old lady in a black silk dress broke down and wept while her son, upon whose shoulders were shining the new silver bars of a First Lieutenant, squeezed back his tears as he supported her."
"One old lady in a black dress." And to here and there and now and then the black silk dress survives.
Don't you remember it, you who lived back there in the oldtime? Don't you remember when the black silk dress stood for the dignity, the fashion, the refinement, the elegance, the ceremony, the maternal simplicity and modesty of womanhood?
Don't you remember the Christian deals, the tenderness, the infinite paience, the sweet voice, the kindly eyes, the gentle hands, the unwavering faith, the unflinching devotion, the untiring devotion of the woman of the black silk dress?

Don't you remember how quietly she looked when she wore it, with the simple lace collar and cap? How year after year on special occasions the one grand robe would adorn her frail form? When the blazon came to dinner? Don't you remember how impressive it was when one of the children was married?
Don't you remember how it defied the changes of time or fashion, how neat and fresh and new it always looked?
Don't you remember how later on her beloved form was always draped in black, in never-ending memory of her loved one who had passed away, and don't you remember still later on as she appeared no more in her accustomed place and then now and then you would take that black silk dress from its place in the closet and let your tears fall upon it as your thoughts clustered upon all that she was?

Have the deft fingers of fashion ever created anything so beautiful, so adorable, so altogether womanly and motherly as that black silk dress of long ago?
Is the garish, the flimsy, the lewd, the freakish, the brazen apparel of degenerate days to be compared with the stately folds of that black dress you knew in the days when life was young, when hearts were pure and sweet, and before the noise, the fever, the vulgarity, the selfishness, the indifference of a sordid humanity had enslaved the world?
And yet here and there and now and then some old woman appears in a black silk dress to remind us of that far-off time in the age of yesterday, when its fashion did not fade and the gold of the dear heart who wore it never tarnished.
