RipplingRhymes (Copyright by George Matthew Adams.)

Oh, these are crucial times, my friends; each day presents its warning; and every time the night descends we think there'll be no morning. Our statesmen rag us from the stump, until they're in a lather, and say we're going to the dump, where all the bow-wows gather. Our sacred rights are trodden flat, our bulwarks badly shaken, and if we don't do this or that we're bound to lose our bacon. It is the bogie, gray and old, of presidential seasons, the wraith that makes our feet grow cold, and hurry; our bulwarks may be on the blink, but we don't pause to worry. The country seems to slide along, and nothing yet has wrecked h, and if its works are badly wrong, we simply don't detect it. And then we put up candidates to cop the White House honor, and these potential magistrates insist the land's a goner. If t'other fellow wins the prize, becomes the nation's master, then we'll confront, with startled eyes, all kinds of black disaster. Once in four years we get this scare, when candidates assemble; we walk the edges of despair, and wring our hands and tremble!
