TITLES FOR POOR MEN.

A short while ago there was a mine explosion near Glasgow. Twenty six men were in the mine at the time and only three escaped. Those three would also have perished had not a fireman numed Charles Riley run fowaru them. He then groped into the workings to alarm the others. He was not again seen alive.

Here is a story best told thus curt ly. It shines enough in its own plainepic. Twice the passion to live unus have sweated the soul of Charles Riley; once when he saw the first smoke, again when he had warned his nearer mates and could have escaped as they did. But he went on into flames that "raged like a furnace"; and when they found the shell of him one of the search party cried, 'That man's wife ought to receive the Victoria Cross."

Who will not chime to the exclamation? Who will not spread the bravest deed in the limelight of warfrensy is paled by those hot heroisms of industrialism's stunning disasters? What is too much of honor to give these unfeshed soldiers who will run to death on a summons that need no be obeyed, whose only court-martial is a man's inner love of his fellows? Charles Riley is not the only man of the mine who has acted this utmost knighthood of self-sacrifide. There is scarce ever a mining disaster that does not anneal in its crucible of agony some such swift-tempered hero. Here, indeed, is the coat-of-arms of democracy, the emblazonment of the great brotherhood of labor, this last sacrifice f r mateship that some of them will always run to make in the face of ugly death. It happens again and again in the engine-room, in the chemical vat, the smouldering magazines, the rank well, and the lethal sewer. Sometimes he is brought out maimed or poisoned—always, after his fleeting day in print, his name and his deed are forgotten by the world.

And so, thinking of Charles Riley, archetype of all that pale array of the forgotten dauntless, I ask why there is no title of honor for poor men who so enrich the greatness of our common humanity, a title that will be theirs for life if they survive, a Great Dreamers.

Robert Louis Stevenson was a great dreamer, and could dream in sequence, continuing a dream from the point where it had broken off the night before. It was in this way that the greater part of "Tekyll and Hyde" was put together. Dante, too, is said to have dreamed many cantos of "The Divine Comedy." and Voltaire records how the "Henriade" came to him in sleep. "Heas occurred to me," he wrote, "in apite of myself and in which I had no part whatever."

Discovery of a prehistoric Turkish bath in Ireland suggests again the thought that most of the things about which modern civilisation boasts are ancient. An actomatic machine was in use to supply sacrificial water in an ancient Greek temple. Queen Maria Theresa had an elevator in her house at Luxembourg at least as early as 1777, and an omnibus was running in Paris in 1662. In 1667 Robert Hooke conveyed sounds to a distance by distended wire—telephone, in fact. ubscription Rats, $1.00 per an Single copies, 10 cents. $1.00 per Dozen Copies.

Gladstone's Nickname.

Lord Gladstone, the Governor General of South Africa, who has been so greatly criticized on account of his action in permitting imperial troops to be used during the recent riots on the Rand, is now fifty-seven years of age. At Eton he was nicknamed "Tuppenee" on account of twopence being remitted off the in ome tax by his father, the G.O.I., the year Herbert first went to that classic school. That cognomen has stuck to him through life and to his intimates the Governor-General of South Africa is still known as "Tuppenee."

When a boy Lord Gladstone was said to have been keenly interested in politics and in history, but he did not particularly distinguish himself in classics, but he was second to none at cricket. He was very sturdily built when a boy of sixteen, with a fine muscular development, and was an excellent gymnast. His love for the country and its pursuits even at a very early age was quite extraordinary, and besides being a first-rate shot, he knew a great deal about forestry and loved every corner of the beautiful Hawarden Park. Of animals "Tuppenee" was very fond. One of his earliest deals in live stock was the purchase of a retriever puppy from the Home for Lost Dogs, at Battersea, which lived for many years, and became a very valuable dog, for which he was offered $100. Musie was always a great delight to him, and he had plenty of pluck and wonderful animal spirits and always viewed the world generally through rose-colored spectacles.

It was a long shot and had been fired as a final warning but Down made or section. warning, but Doret made no outery, nor did he cease coming. Instead his paddle clove the water with the same steady strokes that took every ounce of effort in his body. Runnion threw open his gun and replaced the spent shell. On came the careening, crazy craft in a sidewise drift, and with it the girl saw coming a terrible tragedy. She started to run down the graveled ridge behind her enemy, not realising the value or moment of her action nor knowing clearly what she would do, but as she drew near she saw Runnion raise his gun again and without nion raise his gun again and without thought of her own safety threw herself upon him. Again his shot went wide as he strove to hurt her off, but his former taste of her strength was nothing to this now that she fought for Poleon's life. Runnion snarled angrily and thrust her away, for he had waited till the cance was close.

This time, however, she did not pit her strength against his, but pansed, and as he undertook to fire she thrust at his elbow, then dodged out of his way. Her blow was crafty and well timed, and his shot went wild. Again he took aim, and again she de-stroyed it with a touch and danced out of his reach. She was nimble and light and quickened now by a cold calculation of all that depended up

Runnion, while the cance drove close every instant. On the fourth, as she lashed at him, he struck to be rid of her, cursing wickedly—struck as he would have struck at a man. Silently she crumpled up and fell, a pitiful, fraggied, awkward little figure sprawied upon the rocks. But the delay proved fatal to him, for, though the canoe was close against the bank and the huge man in it seemed to offer a mark too plain to be missed, he was too close to permit careful aim. He was still talking when the girl sprang to her feet and sent a shrill cry out over the river, but instantly be was up and upon her, his hand over her mouth, while she tore at it, screaming the name of Poleon Doret. He allenced her to a smothered, sobbing mumble and turned to see, far iver, a man in a bark cance. The craft had just swing past the bend above and was still a long way off, so far away, in fact, that Necla's signal had not reached it, for its occupant held unwaveringly to the swiftest

They grappled and fought, alone and unseen, and yet it was no fight, for Runnion, though a vigorous, the boat, they might have escaped discovery in the gray morning light had it not been for the telltale fire—a tiny, crackling blaze no larger than a man's hat. It betrayed them. The dancing craft upon which their eyes were fixed whipped about, almost leaping from the water at one stroke, then came toward them, now nothing but a aarsow thing, half again the width of a man's body. The current carried it down ahreast of them, they past, and Runnion rose, releasing the girl, who cried out with all her might to the boatman. He made no sound in reply, heavy muscled man, was beaten down, smothered and crushed beneath the onslaught of this great naked fellow, who all the time sobbed and whined who all the time sobbed and whined and mewed in a panting fury.

They swung half across the spit to the farther side, where they fell in a fantastic convuision, stipping and sliding and relling among the rocks that smote and gouged and bruised them. The gambler fought for his life against the naked flesh of the other amainst the distorted face that cree out win all ner imput to the boatman. He made no sound in reply, but drove his cance shoreward with quicker strokes. It was evident howould effect his landing near the lower end of the spit, for now he was within hearing distance and driving closer overy instant.

Tears fell from his eyes—burning bears, the agony of which seared his soul, He had her carefully beside the water's edge, and, holding her head and shoulders in the crook of his left arm, he wet his right hand and bathed her face, crouething over her, helf unde, dripping with the sweat of his great labors, a tender, palytizing figure of bronzed muscle and since, with all his fury and hate replaced by apprehension and pity. The short moments that he wocked with her were ages to him, but she revived beneath his ministrations, and ber first frightened look of conscious-hess was changed to a melting smile. "W-what happened, Poleon?" she said. "I was afraid."

He stood up to his full height, shaking and weak as the water that dripped from him, the very bones in him dissolved. For the first time he ut-tered words, "Tank God, ha gosh!" and ran his hand up over his wet face. "Where is he?" She started to her knees affrightedly; then, seeing the twisted, sprawling figure beyond, be-gan to shudder. "He—be's dead?" "I den't know," said Poleon carelessly. "You feel it purty good now, eh,

"Yes I be struck me!" The remembranes of what had occurred surged over her, and she buried her face in her hands, "Oh, Poleon, Poleon! He was a dreadful man."
