

The news spread over the city, and through the press reached Canada and the world.

"There will not be many Scotsmen in Argyle-shire," said the St. James's Gazette, "to remember little Donald Harvey MacVicar, who was born at Dunglass, when King William was on the throne, and who was taken to Canada by his father at four years old. That was all but seventy years ago, and Dr. MacVicar has just died a lonely death among his books at the Presbyterian College in Montreal."

The funeral was one of the largest in Montreal for years. People of every religious persuasion, Protestant, Catholic and Jew, and of every calling and profession, every rank and degree of culture, joined in the procession. The streets were lined with spectators. The flags were flying at half-mast on the schools. Teachers and pupils from every section of the city gathered in the vicinity of the High School and formed in line.

At the brief academic service in the Morrice Hall, at which Professor Campbell presided, an earnest tribute in French was paid by Professor Coussirat, and generous words were spoken by Professor J. Clarke Murray, of McGill University.

"It is within a few months of forty years," he said in part, "since I first became acquainted with Principal MacVicar, but in truth it did not require that length of time to form a knowledge of his character. The very vigor of his personality forced expression, and his fearless honesty prevented any
