CHAMBERLAIN AND TARIFF REFORM

Break From the Gladstone Party Was Not Sudden, as Many Supposed.

(From the London Observer.) To this day it is often supposed that Mr. Chamberlain's adoption of Tariff Reform and Imperial Preference was the result of some sudden and violent impulse. Nothing could be further from the truth. When he challenged Free Trade orthodoxy and nailed his theses, as he used to say, upon the church-door of Wittenberg, he did what the thought and experience of years and the circumstances of an immediate emergency conspired to make him do. We have seen that there was in reality nothing novel or abrupt in his overthrow of Mr. Gladstone's power, and it was the same with his revolt against a blind adhesion to Mr. Cobden's doctrines. Before the end of the 'Eighties Mr. Chamberlain had been led from the idea of maintaining the integrity of the United Kingdom to the supreme idea of doing something decisive in our time towards creating the unity of the British Dominions. He had seen in Egypt what we were making of the Dependencies, and he had begun to realize in Canada what might be made of the Dominions. In 1890 he said to Colonel George T. Denison, of Toronto, that he would study the question of preferential trade. "If, after full consideration, I come to the conclusion that this policy will be in the interests of this country and of the Empire, I shall take it up and advocate it."

That was a remarkable statement enough, though made in the strictest privacy and confidence. It showed that Mr. Chamberlain had begun to look at these questions just as Chamberlain did, considering with a fresh mind what might be practically advantageous without regard to whether or not it was theoretically orthodox. When he became Colonial Secretary in 1895 he had two main ideas—to develop in the tropical dependencies "the neglected estates" of the Empire and to draw more closely together the Mother Country and the self-governing Dominions. In June, 1896, he already expressed in a long talk with Mr. Arnold-Forster all the main ideas which formed the foundation of his Tariff Reform policy in 1903. The following year Canada gave a preference to the Mother Country, increased it later to a valuable extent, and was penalized in consequence by Germany. Britain, under a policy of rigid Cobdenism, was helpless either to defend her own interests or those of her Dominions. We had neither the powers of Imperial reciprocity nor of retaliation upon foreign powers, making the most provocative use of hostile tariffs to the political prejudice of the Empire as well as to our own commercial injury. Foreign nations, not content with denying us Free Trade, were seeking to resist by fiscal force, as it were, the voluntary decision of our self-governing Dominions to grant us freer trade under our own flag. To Mr. Chamberlain, this position of fiscal impotence was unendurable; and it confirmed his gathering conviction that passive adhesion to unconditional Cobdenism must be incompatible in the long run, not only with the closer union of the British Dominions, but with the maintenance of Empire on any terms. But though his thought moved upon these lines, let no man think that he acted precipitately.

He assured the present writer long ago that he made every effort, but in vain, to advance in the first case to wards some form of partnership for defence. He found that no progress could be made in that direction. The rejection of every alternative left commercial preference the one promising line of approach towards closer union. For that all the Dominions, and Canada above all, were prepared, but for nothing else. It was shown to be the only way. Then and only then Mr. Chamberlain adopted it. After the rally of all the Britons to the flag in the South African War, it was impossible to his mind that statesmanship at home could be paralysed by a fiscal formula when even a slight modification of free imports upon our part might secure wider markets for our own people under the flag and establish the beginnings of a commercial partnership whence, as in the case of Germany, would surely follow the Union for Defence. In that faith he acted. For that faith he laid down office at the very height of his fame and fortune. He gave life itself, and more than the giving of life, for an endeavor, the greatest, whatever its ultimate result, which any popular leader ever made in the world's history to reconcile democracy and Empire.

Cromer Past Master of Strategy

"The Living Sphinx of Egypt" such was the title once bestowed upon Lord Cromer, the great pro-consul and maker of modern Egypt, who at the moment of writing is reported to be lying seriously ill at his London residence.

Lord Cromer used quick and daring methods in dealing with Egyptian risings. At one time Cairo was almost openly disaffected and the British garrison was small. His lordship, however, caused it to be known that a regiment was on the way from India, but he was careful not to explain that it consisted of sick-leave and time-expired men and bandmen.

All the able-bodied soldiers in garrison were ordered to parade all over the town in small parties and the natives did not take in the fact that they were a sort of stage army—the same men over and over again. The last straw was when Lord Cromer coolly put on flannels and publicly played game after game of tennis.

This final piece of bravado nipped the threatened rising in the bud. Several times during his early days in Egypt Lord Cromer's life was in danger. An English visitor who resembled him was found stabbed to death, having been killed in mistake for the great pro-consul; while on another occasion a dervish was found to have a knife concealed in a petition which he was about to present to his lordship.

And it was because he was always a man of deeds, not words, that Lord Cromer became known as the "Sphinx of Egypt." He made himself a power in Egypt which admitted of no rivalry and, although in 1893, when he was chosen agent and Consul-General, highly-placed Egyptians told him it would be impossible to do away with bribery and the buying and selling of justice in the land, the answer, "I am here to change all that."

Lord Cromer once went to the Khedive to demand the instant dismissal of a high official who was the Khedive's intimate friend. Enraged at the request, the Khedive refused point-blank to dismiss him. "Well," Lord Cromer replied, quite coolly, "unless I have an order of dismissal in five minutes I will go and cable to England at once that I am coming home. That will mean your dethronement." And before Lord Cromer left the palace he had in his pocket the order he had demanded from the despotic Khedive.

The new 3,000,000 pound C. N. R. issue will be introduced on the London market to-day.
