She pressed her hands to her throbbing temples; if she could only still this suffocating beating of her heart—weigh right and wrong calmly, only stills that passionate cry of her whole being, I cannot leave him—I cannot! One misute was left her—but one—before she would be in his presence, held in his arms, his lips pressing hers. Could she think them—could she weigh out the right and the wrong, and be sure to choose the would be right?

Why should I try? she said, desperately, and rose to her feet. I am his—I will not leave him.

She left the room and went down to the atudy; as she drew near the door, her heart seemed to throb in her throat; her knees shook under her; her breath came in quick gasps; but rallying a little after a moment, she opened the door, and stood within the room.

breath in the flerce effort of self-mastery At that moment, victory was his, but honor forbade him to claim it.

My darling! he said, when he could speak, I must not take you at your word; you know not what you say. By and by you will be better able to see that you were right when you said—we must part.

I have tried to see it—tried till my brain grew siok, and I cannot, she said, in the same manner, with desperate appeal in her eyes. If my brother casts me off, what then? I have you—I care to no love but yours.

Heaven help me! Dare said, with white lips, and gently tried to put her from him, but she clung the closer. Marguerite, he said, through his teeth, have pity on me—you are the stronger now—pity on me—you are the stronger now—pity on me—you are the stronger now—pity on great of the form him, but she clung the closer. A few minutes later, Clavering's wife, trembling, clinging to Marguente's arm, came out from her prison.

Will he forgive me, Rita? she whispered, as they traversed the long corridor to time, and the mortality all over the country seems raber to be increasing than abating. Is it possible that medical skill and science can find no means to befile and our chis terrible plague? Physicians seem powerless, and all theories regarding the disease, and all theories regarding the disease, and the seems of t

No, Agness dear; it is best that you two, husband and wife, should be alone. I will see Langton by-and-by.
And yon will come with us, Rita?
But to this Marguerite made no reply; she led Agnes to the door of the library, opened the door, and closed it behind her. She just saw Clawering spring forward with open arms, and she saw no more; even she had no right to be present at that reunion.

She crept away to her own room; she had need of a little solitude; she tried to think; but she could not think; a but she could not think; a but she could not think; but she could not think; she could not think; she could not think; she indicated the could not think; she could not form think; but she could not think; she could not form the silent influence, k-rought Vincent Daro to recognize his sin—to restore the wife to her husband; 22 resign his claim on the sister of the man she had wronged. And now she was to say good-lye to him for ever; they must live their lives a part, because she was Langton Clavering's ister!

She pressed her hands to her throbbing the present that you will cast me off; you cannot forgive him—he does not ask it, lawe made my choice, and I know the cost! Vincent Dare's wife?

The words fell mechanically from Clavering's lipt; he seemed incapable of any gray more. He stood white and light, starting blankly at his sister's b-autiful face.

Agnes sprang forwards, would have thrown her arms round Marguerite, pout that villian persuade you.

No, no! she broke out, passionately, lifting her agonized eyes to his, not the last time! Vincent, hold me for ever—I cannot leave you—what is kindred—what is the world to me? I love you—I am yours!

The blood rushed to the man's very brow, his heart scarcely seemed to beat in the intensity of emotion; he held his hreath in the fierce effort of self-mastery

Hould her up.

Twenty minutes later Langton Clavering and his wile left Estcourt, and if some of the servants wondered who the lady could be who went away with the stranger, and how and waen she had come, it was all conjecture; the truth was not even suspected. How should it be?

Husl and and wife, thus strangely re-

She looked at him, smiling.
How should I fear? she said. How could you fail?

Ah! Marguerite, sweet wife!—the very name made his beart thrill with an ecstasy that checked his speech.

He could only stoop and kiss the soft lips, and in that kiss—sealed fast,

"Was felt the first kiss, and foretold the last."
