In England there are five—namely, two at the British Museum, one at Alemwick Castle, the fourth at Kingston Lacy, Dorsetshire, brought there by William Banks, afriend of Lord Byron, and the fifth and most famous now standing on the Thames embankment. This latter obelisk was the companion of the one still standing at Alexandria, to which place it had been transported from On. Though named after Cleopatra its erection at the Temple of Casar did not occur until the eight year of the reign of Augustus, and several years after the death of the Queen of Egypt. Abdul Lateel says that the obelisk stood in his time—the twelfth century.
