said Frost with an irrepressible twinkle, "but I am talking of your Asiatic lion."
Lady Mabel's eyes danced at this, and she passed an arm through Inthia's.

"What of the Asiatic lion?" she asked innocently, "I promised him that he should not be hunted."

"He is being hunted with a vengeance," Frost returned. "Let me tell you the plain story. You remember the bonds which belonged to me being stolen in transit between Boulogne and Calais? They were stolen, as we know now, by two men, respectively named Gilead Gilføil and William Reid. William Reid is a notorious forger, a skilled distributor of forged bank-notes, and is at this moment on his way to take up a packet of forged notes from his confederate."

"What has all this to do with the Asiatic lion?" her ladyship demanded.

"It sounds terrible," said Frost. "It reminds one of Barrington and the days of the Regency. William Reid, dearladies, is no other than Ronald Morton."

"We have a prettier story than that," said her ladyship. The career of the Asiatic lion shall come to a more agreeable close. From whom did you get this charming narrative, Mr. Frost?"

"I got it," said Frost gravely, "from an unimpeachable source. It ceme to me a quarter of an hour since only from M. Verqueil, a member of the detective staff of Paris, who has hunted this man and his comrades for seven years, and he will have them arrested by the English police to night."

"Really," cried Lady Mabel, "this is them arrested by the English police tonight."

"Really," cried Lady Mabel, "this is delightfully interesting, but you are a day behind the fair, Mr. Frost. Inthia and I knew this half-an-hour ago, Mr. Frost.
No, you sha'n't be plagued any longer, and in place of talking folly and making mystery about it, we ought to be on our knees and saying our prayers for thankfulness. Ronald Morton is not William Reid, Mr. Frost. He is Harry Wynne. He is not a confederate of these vile people, but is bringing to justice with his own hands the wicked wretches who ruined him seven years ago."

his own hands the wicked wretches who ruined him seven years ago."

Frost looked from one to the other in profound astonishment, then with a stammered word of excuse turned away, struggled unceremoniously through the brilliant crowd which filled the ball-room, ran swiftly down stairs, and dashing bare-headed into the street, hailed a passing hansom and leapt into it. He thrust a sovereign through the trap of the cab.

"Drive for your life!" he shouted. "Clerkenwell! There may be a terrible fight," he said to himself, "before these men are captured. The police must know with whom they have to deal, or Harry may lose his life." He Fell Among Thieves he said, "but I could not help it. I should have told the world to-morrow, and you first of all. I had a reason for the delay. I stayed away seven years to make an honorable life for myself. When I came home I found I had assumed the alias of a rascal, a thief and forger. But the hand of heaven was in it. He belonged to the very gang which brought about my ruin, and when they learned that Ronald Morton was in London the soundrels took me for their old companion. I encouraged their belief, and to-night I shall have in my hands the actual proof of that Ronald Morton was in London the scoundrels took me for their old companion. If encouraged their belief, and to-night I shall have in my hands the actual proof of their last villainy. I shall punish the large is reasonable that parted you and me, and I shall do a service to the world at large. I am expecting every moment the message which will call me to them."

As if the words were the cue for Lady Mabel's entrance she came into the conservatory at that moment, and caught sight of the couple sitting hand in hand. She started back for a mere second, and then advanced with an unusual frigidity of manner.

"Mr. Morton," she said icily, "your secretary has brought a note which he describes as being most urgent."

Harry thanked her, and took the missive a workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop, and the workshop opened on the left side as workshop. ner.

Harry thanked her, and took the missive from her hand. He tore it open, and read by the moonlight the simple words "Proofs ready."

"My darling," he said, turning to Inthia, "the message I expected."

At this endearing epithet her ladyship fairly stared.

"Inthis?" she breathed, in a tone of concentrated astonishment.

Inthis rose and cunbraced her, half orying, half laughing.

"Malel, you don't know what has happened. This is my cousin Harry come to like again."
