

threatening to deprive him of this privilege, he took refuge with King Eyo, who it seems had some sort of claim to him. He continued to attend school, and for a time resided in the mission house, but he is now employed by King Eyo in assisting him in his business, so that he can now only give an occasional attendance at school. In his case, and that of several other lads, the king is beginning to reap much benefit from the school. Esien is possessed of a good deal of knowledge, of aptitude in learning; and as he has to all appearance given himself to God with his whole heart, I trust that he will not only be enabled to walk worthy of his profession, but will be eventually an instrument of much good among his fellow countrymen.

I am happy to say that young Eyo has professed his resolution now to give himself to the Lord in baptism."
