Canadian's Escape From Hands of The Turks

THEN TAKEN BY BRIGANDS

The passengers on the C. P. O. S. liner Melita, which arrived in port last night, disembarked at Sand Point this morning. There were only 187 passengers on board, 100 naval ratings for various parts of St. John's, Newfoundland, and the remaining number civilians, a few Australian officers and some Canadian officers, who had seen service in the Royal Naval Air Forces and the in the Royal Naval Air Forces and the to a close Royal Air Forces. The steamer brought from Brest to Boston 1,295 troops and 325 officers, after which she came on to this port to land the other passengers

Captain Haight and his other companion were thrown about for some time and then allowed to depart. They had not proceeded many hours when another band of brigands sighted them and captured them. After beating them with their guns and tying them to trees for some hours they also decided to let them go. Dressed in old sacks which they managed to pick up they wended their way to the nearest railway station and were taken back to the prison camp where they were imprisoned and informed they were to be shot for breaking their parole. They remained in prison until the armistice was signed.
