The Maiden's Choice

ON THE LAIRD OF BIRKENHEAD.

A Tale of the Covenanters.

He rushed away, and Marjory rushed after him, not knowing anything better than that she could do. But, in following him down the slippery bank which led to the foot of the ravine, she lost her footing, and rolled like a ball with amazing velocity, till brought up by a thin bush, into the centre of which she was precipitated, with no further damage than a few painful scratches.

Her fall and rapid descent arrested Walter in his headlong career, and he turned aside to extricate her. This done he directed her to go to the hollow below, where the horse was fastened, and there wait his re-appearance. With this direction he again darted downward, leaving Marjory to gather together her scattered and jumbled wits, and go to the spot he indicated.

The place which Walter had to penetrate was difficult and dangerous even in daylight, but doubly so in the darkness of that November night. He had to climb the rugged side of the ravine and draw himself up the face of a precipice, which would have been inaccessible but for the tough bending stems of the birches which grew in every crevice. The thought occurred to him that probably there was a smoother and easier path to the cleft in which was the entrance to the cave, but he had neither the patience nor opportunity to search for it; and difficult and arduous though his random ascent was, he was in the frame of mind to overcome gigantic obstacles. With Marjory in the terrible danger which he knew threatened her, his strength and daring knew no limits. The passion seething in his heart threw an unnatural energy into his frame, and he scaled the almost perpendicular slope by exertions which seemed nearly superhuman.

When about midway to the base of the mountain wall, his eye was caught by a light shining from an open window, the only lighted window in the rear of the building, which he knew to be Marjory's room, and he judged that she must be there, that probably she had fled to it for refuge. This, which was fortunate, because if he was able to penetrate to the interior of the house, he could reach that room by a private staircase, and might thus do so unseen by Allan or the troopers.

Inspired by this hope he resumed his laborious climb, and stood at length on a narrow rocky ledge immediately under the strong walls which rose overhead in dark irregularity, the wings and buttresses following the projections and recesses of the precipice. Here he was brought to a standstill. In front were many yards of solid masonry, which effectively barred his further progress, and on either side masses of perpendicular rock, along the steep side of which he could not pass. He crossed his quivering hand over his forehead to recall to his recollection the exact position of the cleft, as he had noticed it that night, when first he made the discovery of its existence. This was no easy task in the present excited state of his mind, and it was made more difficult by the snow which covered the sides of the cleft, and which seemed utterly to change its appearance.

The result of some minutes' reflection and observation convinced him that he had mis-estimated too far. The well and the cave being constructed below the foundations of the mansion, the entrance to the latter must be some distance beneath where he now stood, and also a little lower down. If he could get round the shoulder of the rugged projection at his right, he thought he would have some chance of coming upon what he sought. He, therefore, slid down several yards in the direction of the cleft, and taking a few steps in a lateral direction found himself on the edge of a narrow chasm, on the opposite side of which he thought he recognised the anxious-ly sought-for cleft.

This chasm he must of necessity leap across, and if he failed to clear the distance, he would roll down the abyss, and be dashed to pieces. It was a terrible crisis which he now confronted. Not his own life merely, but Marjory's fate hung upon the issue, and this terrible realization struggled with fear-ful impetuosity in his bosom. Holding by the hand the slender bush which gave him his support, he bent forward and strove to measure with his eye the width of the empty space which separated him from the opposite side. It was a great leap, but one which a strong active man might clear, particularly a man animated by his feelings and having his purpose to accomplish.

While in this strained attitude of examination, a cry reached him from the rear of the swollen stream, as it dashed over the rocks, but distinct enough to reach the keen ear of love. It was a cry from Marjory, and he heard her pronounce his name in a tone of wildest anguish. That cry came like a spur to his resolution, and had the chasm been twice as wide, he would have leaped on the instant with the same mad bound. He cleared it and more, for his bound was so impetuous that he would have been projected forward, if a guarded bridle had not received and retained him. He recognised the spot as that on which he had stood when first he had explored the cave within, and with that anguish cry ringing in his ears, he dashed into the cleft, and in a very few moments groped his way into the cave, which had been to the two ministers such a safe hiding-place.

The darkness was of course profoundly intense, but the youth had a perfect recollection of the conformation of the place, and without difficulty gained the aperture in the side of the well. Here a terrible fear smote his heart with dismay. If Andrew had removed the rope from the window, it was impossible for him to ascend to the mouth of the well, and he would be baffled in his enterprise—a thought so dreadful to be endured, even for a moment.

He drew his rapier, and with a hand that trembled with the intensity of his excitement, thrust it forward into the aperture to feel if the rope was there. Oh joy! he felt that it was. The thick rope hung as it had been left when the fugitives ascended from their concealment, and now it was ready to serve his all-important purpose. By the aid of the rapier he drew it towards him till he felt his hand nervously clutch it; then, replacing the weapon in his bosom, he fearlessly swung himself into the shaft of the well. His body struck against the opposite side, but the rope held firm above, and putting forth his utmost strength, he pulled himself hand over hand till he found himself at the window, which he securely grasped, and vaulting upon it, crossed the beam, and dropped on the floor of the cell.

Though panting, breathless, and streaming with perspiration, caused by his betwixt-ent fear, he would not allow himself a moment's rest, but rushed away through the darkness along the passages, and through the underground chambers towards the upper portion of the mansion. There was not a single ray, even the faintest, to relieve the gloom, but his quickened brain received at the moment such a vivid impression of the many turnings, ascents, and descents, that the want of light was almost no disadvantage to him, and with but few stumbles he found his way to the vicinity of the kitchen, where the entrance to the subterranean place was situated.

Excited though Walter was he had not lost all prudence or self-control, and as he drew near to where he might be seen or heard, he became conscious of the necessity of proceeding with caution and silence. The wisdom of so doing was soon made manifest, for no sooner had he issued from the doorway of the passage than a strong light streamed in front of him, proceeding from the kitchen, where the troopers were noisily enjoying themselves. That strong light by which they were surrounded, and the loud noise of their revelry, made it less dangerous for Walter to go on, for the one, by contrast ity, and the other prevented them from hearing the sound of his footsteps on the stone floor.
