The Braes of Yarrow An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

CHAPTER XL.—IN THE FOREST. The first flight of arrows the Forestiers shot They wounded him on the knee; And out spake the seventh Forestier, The next will gar him die. Johnny set his back against the alk. His fist against a stake; And he has slain the seven Forestiers, He has slain them a' but ane. He has broken three ribs in this man's side. But his collar bane; He laid him twauid over his steed— Hele him carry the killing bane. Gilbert look up the bank of Etrick water as if purposing to go through Gilman-cleuch, but this was merely to blind whoever might be following him; for that he was followed he had no doubt. In reality he meant to avoid the glen, for knowing that for some secret reason the dwarf was a partisan of the cause of Spens, he deemed his warning worth heeding. So when he had got about a mile beyond Crosses, he forded the current and took the west side of Dodhead, with intent to go by Hindehope to Belkirk, procure a fresh horse there, and then make straight for the capital. He had not, however, advanced more than half a mile after crossing the Etrick when he heard the distant note of a bugle. A few minutes after the signal was answered by a still more distant note. "Supposing" that these sounds intimated the discovery of his hiding place he urged his jaded horse forward. The poor animal, already fairly exhausted with its lengthened journey, made a feeble effort to quicken its pace in obedience to whip and spur. But the pace was little increased after all, and the extra exertion forced upon it served to exhaust his remaining strength the sooner. The feet were lifted like weights and fell with dull thuds upon the turf. Gradually, in despite of frequent promptings, the pace slackened and the gallop was barely as fast as a fresh horse might have trotted with ease. Now he began to hear the distant tread of a body of horse, which gradually became louder—louder as the pursuers lessened the distance between them and the pursued. At length with the muffled sound of hoof-treads was mingled the clatter and clank of of armour. He had escaped an ambush, but it was clearly not intended that he should altogether elude his enemies—whoever they were.— Upon the latter score he had little difficulty in obtaining a conclusion; although why Tushlaw should allow him to leave the Tower unharmed, and then endeavor to entrap him on the way, he could not understand. The sky was unclouded, the air was clear, the wind unobscured, and the stars shed a soft light on hill and dale. The trees of the forest made long shadows on the ground, and beneath them was darkness. Finding that his pursuers were gaining rapidly upon him, he forsook the bridge path and dived into the forest. About twenty paces into the darkness and he halted, intending to wait there until the pursuers had passed, when he might take to the hill again and avoid them by passing round the eastern side of Hindehope. The pursuers, about twelve in number, came clattering up, and thundered by the place where their quarry lay concealed. "They are not like to find me again to-night," he thought, as he began to move out of his hiding-place. He checked himself immediately as he discovered by the sudden cessation of the sounds of movement that the troopers had halted. They had by some means become aware that their victim was doubling upon them. The troopers had been made aware of this fact by a brace of sleuth hounds, whose guidance they were following. The hounds had overshot the mark by about twenty paces at the place where Gilbert had turned into the forest, and losing the scent, they turned and ran about sniffing the ground and whining. TO BE CONTINUED.
