The Bareheaded Habit.

New York Evening Sun. This is a bareheaded summer. Go where you will in the country, you will find a pretty general discarding of the hat. Men and women go about with nothing but their hair as a protection from the sun. You will get glimpses of girls flying along country roads on bicycles in this condition. Perhaps it is simply a fashion, a craze of the moment. Perhaps it is something more. One fact is assured—there is a greater sanity in the clothes worn in the country now than was the case some time ago. This must be laid down to the exigencies of bicycling and golfing. Throughout the day the young person out of town is less artificial in the matter of clothes than she used to be some years ago. For one thing, she is less afraid of wind and sun. Perhaps the bareheaded habit is only an outcome of this.
