more frequent. I've no hope nor courage to try to get well—I am just sinking under the burden of my unhappy, unmanly life, and my best hope may soon be to become unconscious and remain so forever. And wet I fully believe that are kind word from unconscious and remain so forever. And yet I fully believe that one kind word from you would inspire me with the wish, the power to live. My mother is blind to everything except her worldly maxims of life. She means to do her duty by me, and is conscientious in her way, but she is killing me by slow torture. If you would give me a little hope, if you would wait—oh, pardon the selfishness of my request, the pitiable weakness displayed in this appeal! Yet, how can I help it? Who can sink into abselute despair without some faint struggle—some effort to escape. I have had the happiness of heaven in your have only to say that there is no hope, and I will soon cease to trouble you or any one much longer."
