SATURDAY MORNING NOV. 8, 1884.

"Why and How." The other day we said that while protection was blamed for causing low wages and hard times in the United States, we could with more force show that free trade was the cause of hard times in England. And thereupon the Hamilton Times demands "why and how." First let it be understood that what ar called low wages in the States would be called high wages in England. Our neighbors an to accustomed to big wages, good living, big and big figures for everything, profits and big lightes for poverty and that they complain of poverty and hard times whenever they are curtailed s little of their accustomed indulgences. Take the ordinary run of workingmen, in England and in the States respectively, and we may say that what the former count as luxuries are counted by the latter as the merest es, without which nobody would keep house. American workingmen strike against a reduction of wages from $8 to $7 per week; English workmen, in corresponding occupations, strike against a reduction from $5 to $4 per week. The expression "hard es" has a realistic meaning about it in lingland that it has not in America, except in certain slums of great cities, where European vice and pauperism have been carried bodily oss the ocean and dumped down on this side of it. There are, in New York and Chicago, whole colonies of foreigners, who are in America though not of it, and who, on this new continent cling most tenaciously to their old ways of living.

Free trade is cortainly one of the cause though by no means the only cause, of low wages and scarcity of work in England. Here let us go back a little, in order to get a proper beginning. In 1851, just a few years after the great free trade vietory in England, the world was invited to visit Sydenham palace, and see what was there to be seen. Many foreigne of an observing turn of mind did come, and used their faculties to such good purpose that they returned home fully convinced that they had mastered many secrets of England's nanufacturing greatness, and dete to do what they could to rival her in her own ethods. England invited the nations come and see what she was doing, in the hope that after seeing her immense variety of cheap wares they would buy more largely from her than ever before. They went home, deter, mined that to the extent of their ability they , not her customers, as she was expecting, but her competitors. Years afterwards it was a current remark among some of England's shrewdest manufacturers and exporters that her free trade lesson of 1851 had ost her dearly, or words to that effect. Some great wars on the continent of Europe and the American civil war, did through waste and destruction kcep up for a number of years an enormous demand for English goods, so that the natural, proper effects of free trade on one side only did not show themselves on the surface. But a marked change came soon after the close of the Franco-German war, say in 1872-73. Then foreign goods began to pour into England, and they have been pouring in ever since. Nay, even during these hard times, when English shops are closing and English workmen going idle, the floor of foreign goods admitted free of duty till, continues to pour in. For about ter years past the British trade returns have wofully deceptive as regards exports. been worully deceptive as regards exports. They tell of millions worth of goods shipped abroad, supposed to be of Fritish manufacture which are really foreign manufacture to the extent of one-half or three-fourths. The manufacture of so-called Sheffield cuttlery and other steel goods is a large business in Germany. The goods are ordered by British merchant who put Sheffield names and lapels on them, and ship them as such. And so with many textile manufactures of wool, silk and some times even of cotton: the products of fereign looms are sent abroad as English. In other words, English merchants are building up an export trade which, to a large extent employs foreigners instead of Englishmen. And thus free trade becomes one very potent cause of hard times. So much for the present in answer to "why and how ?"

It looks very much like sending coals to Newcastle; but, let the event tell. "There is no trust like trying," so runs the old proverb. " Ladies' Journal " Bible Competition No. 9. Notwithstanding the very low price wheat, the bakers' union keeps up the price of bread in Paris, and bread riots have begun. By law, or custom, or both, French mun palities have power to 'fix what the price and weight of bread shall be. A Negligent Class of Voters. A remark made by the New Orleans Times-Democrat on the eve of the presidential election is worthy of recording. Speaking of the prospect of a peaceable election and the probable absence of all rioting, it urges this as a able absence of an rioting, it and to do their reason that none should be afraid to do their duty at the ballot, and adds: "Those gentlemen who, on account of their wealth, position or talents have a high standing in our com munity should not be lost to the political world altogether, should not refuse to share in the election, but should vote."

This is a hint that applies to many other places besides New Orleans and to many other s'ections besides a presidential one. Expressions frequently repeated at various meetings of a political character in Toronto would go to show that even here there exists a negligence of this nature. Although happily it is an assertion to which many exceptions can be found, yet as a general thing wealth, position, and talent do not take that active interest in political events which they andoubtedly should do. The Times Democrat is quite right in thus "calling them out." The franchise is a duty, not a privilege to be used or left unused as caprice may dictate.

Social science is the most intricate of sci. ences, and politics are its most intricate branch. To leave the study and conduct of this so all-important a province to the uneducated and the rude and oftener still to the biassed and the interested is a real crime against society. Governments place in the hands of their subjects certain duties in the shape of a request that they shall at certain mes place clearly on a piece of paper, to wit. the ballot, their "yes" or "no" to the adoption of certain measures or the election to office of certain men. If the subjects of such government care not to aid in the expression of pub
