A man-servant portraiture known as "The Man-Servant" by the artist, John H. M. Rockett believes it is well all concerned to take a look at a thinge that the movies have done the few brief years they have been among us:

"The moving picture has lengthened the lives of the old by giving them new interest in life. The neighborhood theater, easy of access from the homes of the old people. It has brought the youth with the news of the world."

KEEP UP-TO-DATE.

"It helps the parents to keep up date with the kiddies and keeps the family together in the evening, and girls are not in mischief when their mothers are away. It is a respectable parents should keep kiddies away from it."

EDUCATIONAL WORK.

"In educational work its usefulness has no limit. It is in all large schools, colleges and universities and has been found so much superior to the text-book that educators look for it to revolutionize educational methods. Its use tends to quicken instruction and, therefore, it is the best method of teaching and this brings girls and boys into new channels of production at an early age, the grand result being to lighten the burden of the economic burden of the world and greatly to lessen poverty."
Thomas A. Edison said recently that "we could teach children more history minutes with a film than they learn in two text-books."
"It has vastly aided the health sciences by spreading broadcast knowledge of hygiene and sanitation and has been of great service in surgery and the care of the sick."

George Radlin, 924 Marion avenue, Nicholas Soroke and another man not yet under arrest, induced Mrs. Radlin to part with $1,000 of her husband's savings. Soroke, who was caught by Radlin after a long chase to-night, while admitting his part in the theft, declined to divulge the name of his accomplice.

Mrs. Radlin told the police that the money was given to Soroke and her husband's money in "half an hour," by raising the denomination of the bills, persuaded her to hand them the cash. When Soroke's partner changed a $10 bill to $20, they departed. Radlin arrived as the money was being run away. He caught Soroke, who tossed the roll to his accomplice.

The lives of the idle rich are disclosed in the William Rox production, "Blind Wives," coming to the Grand Theater on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

The main or the secondary theme of the production. These adventures, however, are not smothered in witty or sentimental songs and dances and symphonized music—the adornments of sex are so irritated by the imagination of the playwright and the business acumen of the business manager—that the audience ends by being lulled into a

Now it is just this kind of adventure, too, which brings about the conditions that form the situations of the Breuix drama. The difference between the two is a difference in what I may call the musical comedy emphasis laid upon that attitude, and that feeling which in modern literary parlance has come to be called the "joy of life," and the emphasis laid upon it in such a critique of life as in "Agouti" by

In the first instance we have the emphasis of "wine, women and song"—the whole world lusting and living with the thought of the pleasures of the senses.

In the first instance we have the emphasis of "wine, women and song"—the emphasis of the present, of the moment, with no thought of the morrow: the things and the persons of the morrow must be sacrificed to themselves. After us the world! Ours the dance!

In the second instance the emphasis has to do with to-morrow entirely. A man whose overturned tables and spilled wine and women have been the morrow whose ray light falls not upon last night's revels, but upon a woman who has been the morrow, who has pockets for coin wherewith to pay the piper for a tune to which he has not listened.

Is it, then, because Brieux shows us the evils of loose living seriously and not flippantly, because, short of all ornamentation, he visualizes the real situation of the man and the woman into whose hands and selling of things not lawful to be sold, the things of the morrow must pass then down to untold generations of the innocent misfortune—that we are not to be deceived by the child's play?

In the Brieux play the child is not seen. There is no stage representation

For that pimpled little one, with his pimpled face, its catarrh, its sores at the back of the throat. For all that, the child—like the Nemesis of the Greek rimpled face, its catarrh, its sores at the back of the throat. For all that, the child-like the Nemesis of the Greek tragedians, the Nemesis of Shakespeare's tragedy—perdure—and permeates the scene. When he called attention to baby they should have called it "the babe," as the poet does, and let it flow through her that outcast creature still at the rich man's table, lives his life, is made one with his family, mingles his blood with theirs, and thus endures until the days of vengeance are accomplished.

There is no necessity to outline the plot. There is no need to tell us that George Dupont, not worse than the others, better than some, he thinks; a man who has "longed for the taste of power since he was a boy." He has "tired eyes and pale faces," but who has put these things from him; a man who has lived "almost straight," victim of what men call an accident.

There is a woman, Henrietta Lonches,

There is a woman, Henrietta Lonches, an ordinary middle-class young woman, who has been the victim of a crime of which the whole life has taken by the scruff of the neck and intends to chastise. Why? Apparently just for the fact that she has loved a married man.

There is George's mother and Henrietta's father; the one a woman, with a terrific maternal instinct and an extraordinary sense of duty, the other a goodly respectable married man, who has lived down the follies of his youth, fiercely insist upon the chastity and the safety of his own women folk, but not so concerned with the chastity of the prostitute, but he's, as Kipling would say is "another story." There is a nurse, an ordinary grasping French woman, who has been the victim of a crime, which takes place in a Paris hospital,

Above all these characters, however, at least so far as the didactic end of the work goes, is—the Doctor.

Above all these characters, however, at least so far as the didactic end of the work goes, is—the Doctor.

The doctor is the one who makes us see him in our midst every day—scientific, kindly, knowing human nature too well to despise it; loving it rather, in all its life and weakness, and reaching out the forgiveness of bodily health, and the forgiveness of all sins save the physical.

This man, product of the university and the clinic, has the science of the prevention of disease at his fingertips, but no machinery wherewith to get "preventive" action of the people. He has no arms, no weapons, no power. He recognizes labor, agriculture, education (of a certain sort), but not health. No portfolio for Public Health. Heaps and heaps of health, but no power for the defense of property. Only pickings for the defense of life—life that goes down quicker than by ways of industry and war. And in these days that is "going some."

quicker than by ways of industry and war. And in these days that is "going some."

from the lips of Brioux's "Doctor" we learn that the disease of which the play treats is generally contracted because of the "disease of the mind," becoming dangerous from want of proper care, because—"I didn't know." It is passed on from person to person because—"I didn't know."

There is a doctor in this city who will not substantiate the statement of his colleague of the Brioux drama.

right if that were the whole case. But the Canadian Government is not asking for the transfer of the road on such terms. The company is asking the Government to pay for the railway debt as it becomes due. Canada has already paid a good many such arrears, and now is asking the company either to look after its own payments or consent to the transfer of those to the Government. The company continue to pay, and the Government continue to manage. — Vancouver Province.
