Although the weather was unfavorable the Temperance lecture given in the Methodist church by Rev. W. Millson of London last Thursday evening was well attended.

The Bethesda and Kerwood orchestras furnished delightful music and the reading given by Mrs. Howard McLean in her usual good style was well chosen. The duet by Mrs. Johnson and Mrs. Langford and the choruses by the choir were much enjoyed. Rev. Millson's address on temperance was very interesting and instructive. He spoke of Kerwood Women's Missionary Society being among the first to hold this public temperance meeting and spoke of the need of the people rousing themselves and getting more important information on this important subject and that every Christian should do his duty in the coming referendum. Mrs. Langford, president of the W.M.S. then moved a vote of thanks to all who helped make the evening a success and especially to Rev. Millson for his kindness in coming to Kerwood and giving his splendid lecture.

MARIE CORELLI
Famous Authoress a Recluse
Lived in World of Her Own

Although Marie Corelli, who lived and died in Shakespeare's town, was always a mystery to the professional interviewer, some of us Stratfordians met her at social functions and were able to see her at close range, writes a Stratford correspondent of the London Daily News.

But not often—for she was at heart a recluse, shutting herself in a world of her own behind the high way that surrounded her beautiful Italian garden, and of late years never taking part in the public life of Stratford.

When I was a boy attending a local school Miss Corelli, who was a personal friend of the principal, came several times to present the prizes. She was a fluent speaker, and, whatever the critics may say to the contrary, she had a ready wit and a genial presence. She loved children.

Hated Sectarianism.
It has been said that the author of "God's Good Man" and other satires on the church had no love for organized religion and that she never attended a place of worship. But that is untrue. What Miss Corelli hated was narrow sectarianism, and when on the death of King Edward VI, a united memorial service of church people and Nonconformists was held in Shakespeare's historic church, Miss Corelli sat next to me in an unobtrusive corner of the building.

When the late General Booth visited Stratford she entertained him to tea, and a local leader of the Salvation Army told me afterward that the general and Marie Corelli prayed together. The general was greatly impressed by his visit, which resulted in a generous contribution to his funds. He left one worrying instruction to the poor little woman captain who was then in command at Stratford—that she would be held responsible for looking after Miss Corelli's spiritual welfare.

Miss Corelli's aversion to being photographed was very strong, for she was in her heyday a distinctly striking woman. Americans often waited outside her house, the front door of which was flush with the street, in order to snap her with their kodaks. But she was too cute for them and I have seen more than one photographer politely asked to put his camera away before Miss Corelli would come out of the house.

Glaring Error.
All the newspaper biographies I have read contain a glaring error. Miss Corelli's quarrel with Stratford had nothing to do with the Shakespeare memorial. It originated in the question of a site for the Carnegie Public Library. The corporation of Stratford decided to pull down an old half-timbered house which had been bricked over—like so many other buildings in Stratford—and Miss Corelli protested against such vandalism, urging that the brickwork should be removed, the building restored, and that another site near by should be used for the public library. Miss Corelli did not succeed in her argument. There was much local trouble, which concluded with the libel action brought by Miss Corelli against a member of the council, in which she was awarded a farthing damages.

Stratford thought that Miss Corelli "interfered". So she did. Stratford needed interference. This devotee of Shakespeare realized that Stratford was all for modernizing itself whereas she knew that Stratford's charm lay in its Old World associations. And so began the restoration movement.

In Stratford Miss Corelli was regarded in recent years as inaccessible rather than eccentric. The only real peculiarities I remember were her purchase of two tiny Shetland ponies and a chaise in which she drove about for some months, and the gondola in which she enjoyed the Avon from a curtained seat. The gondola, however, was no mystery. A local boat proprietor paddled it and it kept to the main stream with other river craft.

In spite of her caustic comments in "The Devil's Motor Car." Miss Corelli owned a speedy car. There was a touch of irony, however, in its mascot—a silver model of his satanic majesty in flight!

Strangled with Asthma is the only expression that seems to convey what is endured from an attack of this trouble. The relief from Dr. J. D. Kellogg's Asthma Remedy is beyond measure.
