310 The Forge in the Forest and stretched out his hand to me; but I ignored the invitation.

"And what — what have you got for me, Mizpah?" I asked, in a very low voice, indeed — a voice perhaps not just as steady as that of a noted bush-fighter is supposed to be at a crisis.

The flush grew, deepening down along the clear whiteness of her neck, and she half put out one hand to me.

"Do you want thanks?" she asked softly.

"You know what I want, — what I have wanted above all else in life from the moment my eyes fell upon you!" I cried with a great passion, grown suddenly forgetful of Grûl and Big Etienne, who doubtless found my emotion more or less interesting.

For a second or two Mizpah made no answer. Then she lifted her face, gave me one swift look straight in the eyes, — a look that told me all I longed to know, — and suddenly, with a little laugh that was mostly a sob, put Philip into my arms.