CLIMATE AND RESOURCES.

THE CLIMATE.

The climate of the Pacific Province is spoken of by all who visit this coast as one of its great attractions; it can hardly fail to please since there are several climates to choose from. The person who cannot stand cold weather and shudders at the sight of ice, can find ample space for enterprise or temptation to idleness in a land that might have suggested "The Loto-Eaters." On reaching Vancouver Island or the coast line of the mainland, like them, he need "no longer roam," for there he will find a climate such as he desires.

"What strikes an Englishman most about the climate is its serenity, the absence of the biting east winds, and the less need than in England of an umbrella during the spring, summer, and the prolonged autumn. He notices, also, with surprise and pleasure, that rainy weather here does not tend to depress the spirits as it does in England. The invigorating quality of the climate remains throughout the year.

"The cool nights in Vancouver Island, and in all parts of the Province, freshen the heat-worn denizens of California and the Atlantic States. Such visitors linger before leaving the Province, and long to return.

FARMING.

Although the general surface of British Columbia is rugged and mountainous, there are thousands of acres of valley land, as fertile and productive as any the sun shines upon in its daily round. This land is of three classes—the alluvial bottoms lying along the water courses; the more level portions of the uplands of the islands and coast, and the mountain districts of the interior, now covered with timber, but possessing excellent soil and yielding largely when cleared and cultivated; the treeless benches and table lands of the interior, which are highly productive when watered by irrigation. These embrace a total of not less than ten thousand square miles of arable soil, so diverse in character, climatic conditions and location, as to be suitable for the production of every fruit, cereal, vegetable, tree, plant and flower known to the temperate zone.
