SENORITA MILOCITA.
The Cuban Dancer Speaks Charmingly of Life at Havana
During the War.
Senorita Milocita, a celebrated Cuban dancer, was in the city yesterday. She came direct from Havana.
The senorita sat in her apartments, clad in a Parisian costume, that set off her graceful figure to perfection. Her hair is long and black and her eyes dreamy and languorous, lit up as the visitor was announced. She smiled and said: "Buenos dias, senor."
"You will not be shocked at my smoking, I hope. It is common, you know, for Cuban ladies to smoke," she said.
"And you want to know of life in Havana and the dreadful times there? Well, there were none. Havana was safe. That is what you call fudge. There were no rats and no cats eaten; it is not true. There was plenty to eat for those who could pay for it, and, you know, wine is always plentiful."
"It is evident you have not suffered very much," remarked The World.
"Suffer? Not at all. I have been playing at the Teatro Theatre, the largest, I believe, in the world, since once a week. Blanco would come, with his suite. I threw kisses to Blanco, and outside every night was a guard of honor assembled, for, you know, our theatres are more open in construction than yours, and it was the duty of the guard to direct the traffic around the 'parado,' otherwise the audience could not hear for the noise. There the military bands played every evening also, for, we are a gay people, despite everything."
"And what part do you take in the play?"
"Oh! I was the laughing response, 'I am a dancer. I perform all the Cuban and Spanish national dances, and the well-shaped foot beat a restless tattoo on the carpet."
"What do I know of Blanco? Well, I know he was very disgusted that the American ships never came within range of his guns, as some of the largest and most modern ones were mounted on Morro Castle. Blanco swore and the people had bull fights every Sunday, and cock fights every night."
"Did you ever see a bull fight?" asked the senorita, with a rather anxious light in her eyes, afraid perhaps of the effect of her question. The World assured her that it was one of the things looked forward to.
"As to Bull Fights."
"Oh, I enjoy them ever so much, and everyone in Havana goes to see the children, and hold them above the crowd to see the sport. You see the people there have grown up with bull fights, and are so accustomed to them they miss what you call the cruelty in the excitement. You know, there is a grand prize and the prize of the keys of the bull's stall, which is kept dark. Then the bull is liberated, and as he comes out he is guarded by the fiercest fighting used to the light is a horse. He immediately charges him, aiming at the horse's shoulder, and if he does not miss, he kills him up and down. This is what is called 'letting him smell blood,' and is only introductory. Sometimes, when he does so, he will stand guard over the horse, refusing to move, and the bull fighters stick darts, twisted with colored ribbons, into him."
"How the matador approaches with his 'espada,' a slim steel blade, and it is very interesting to see him kill the bull. You know, he tries to get the animal with his four legs planted wide apart; this opens the shoulder blades, and the matador strikes downwards to the heart."
"And what then, Senorita?"
"Oh, well, if his aim is true, the bull falls. That is all. But if the crowd sees the bull is being merely murdered, they cry out 'Lasso,' and the bull is dragged away and killed outside."
"Blanco Worked."
"Do I know anything personal about Blanco? Well, he was more than a man. He was a hero, and he worked night and day, extending the fortifications. The military men, you know, were confident that the Americans could never have taken Havana, and all the vacant land in the town was planted with seed for food, and the place could have stood six months without further assistance."
"What is the feeling of the Spaniards?"
"Oh, the people generally are loyal. Any feeling for the Cubans—the negroes, as they are called—is quickly suppressed. As the scribe rose an attendant entered with a valise and the Senorita explained that she was leaving immediately for Montreal and the east generally.
"I may take an engagement after some weeks, either in Canada or New York; I have had numerous applications."
"She Kicked His Hat."
As The World prepared to say good-bye, holding his hat in his hand, the Senorita proffered her services for a kick. The hat was held up at the height of the shoulder. Her ladyship arranged her skirts.
"Mas alto," she cried, and the hat was raised. Finally, when the scribe was so raised, holding his hat as high as he could, there was a rattle and dash of hoofs, and a shoe and the hat gracefully flew to the floor.

At the Toronto.
Although large staff of workmen has been working steadily on the alterations to the new Toronto Opera House, it was thought, up to a few days ago, to be impossible to have the theatre in ship shape condition for the opening on Monday night. Lessee Small then removed all fears of a possible disappointment by engaging an extra force to continue the work at night and by offering a bonus for the completion of the alterations on schedule time. He has succeeded in making it certain that the alterations will be open for business on Monday. By that time the carpenters and masons and decorators will have finished their work, the elegant new carpets will be put down and the box offices will be open under the auspices of Mr. A. H. O'Neill, for the sale of seats for Monday and Tuesday evenings. This company, which is to open the house, is said to consist in part of a number of very clever specialty performers, who, in addition to their respective "turns," take part in the telling of the story of the two Irishmen, who, grown suddenly rich, are endeavoring to break into the "crust of society," and who incidentally create a great deal of amusement for the audience thereby. With its good music, new jokes and stories and its dancing and acrobatic performance, "Pinnegone's 400" seems to be making a success in other places.

A Jammed Foot.
John B. Stegmann, 175 Sherbourne-street, had his foot badly crushed shortly before 6 o'clock last night. He was engaged in taking in some goods at Messrs. John Macdonald & Company's warehouse, when the elevator came down, squeezing the limb against the wall. Dr. Ball was summoned and the injured man was sent home in the ambulance. It will be some time before he is able to be moved again.

Nearly a Fatality.
The schooner yacht Estelle, owned by Patrick Phelan, Brock-street, set out on Thursday for a two weeks' cruise. There were five fully tar on board. All went safely till off Victoria Park, when the yacht sprang to great to be staunch, so the yachtmaster loaded up the dingy with his supplies and managed to reach the shore in safety before the Estelle went down.
