What Is Fascination of Picnics?

What is the peculiar fascination of picnics? That is a question which many people in the city should be ready for today, as there were at least twenty large plenies held at Port Stanley and Springbank yesterday. It cannot be that the ride on the electric cars is an enjoyment. Usually they are so crowded that it de on the electric cars is an enjoyment. Usuany they are so clowded that impossible to ride with any degree of comfort whatever. It cannot be the is impossible to ride with any degree of comfort whatever. It cannot be the food which is eaten. Much better can be procured with home conveniences. Surely it is not the races and games which the present day's tight skirts and imactivity render but a farce! A superabundance of fresh air may have something to do with it, but then people don't usually go off in large and jolly companies merely for the henefit of their health.

What is, then, the reason that during the summer months every organizawhat is, then, the reason that during the summer months every organization, or society or group of people must migrate for a whole day to the country? The answer seems to be this: Deep down in every civilized soul there still remains a spark of the primitive. Hundreds of years have failed to blot out of the memory of man the feeling that he was once a savage. The call of the wild still faintly sounds within him. And when the delightful days of spring and summer come there is sure to be a time when he cannot resist that call, and

Large picnics are but the simplest means of giving him the opportunity which he craves. Persons in authority sense the restlessness of those associated with them, and the picnic happens as a sort of exhaust, without which the whole organization might blow up and burst. Of course, in a great many instances, picnics have become annual affairs, and no one troubles to figure out why they happen. But just let them be missed for a way on the course and they happen. happen. But just let them be missed for a year or two, and then the reason

And so men and women, still a tiny mite savage at heart, leave their comfortable homes and well-prepared meals, to jam into crowded cars, drink sicklylooking lemonade and munch dry sandwiches plentifully besprinkled with sand, because they enjoy it. And they chase each other wildly over the green, simply because they enjoy it. And they chase each other when over the green, stumbling and tearing their clothes, and streaming with perspiration, to win a bag of pop-corn which they don't want to eat. What a farce it all seems, and yet how utterly delicious!—ROSALYNDE.
