

for a ten you go to Butterfield and buy things and pawa 'em afterwards! Why you're mad!"

CHAPTER VIII.

Between eight and nine o'clock that night the continental mail flying fast through the dark between London and New York, Harry Wynne and his troupe were in it. It was a wild night, and there were but a few passengers, so that he had a compartment to himself. He stood upright in order that he might read by the light of the carriage lamp a document which his sorrow was set forth with a dreadful legal precision. This document bore the initials, "Wynne," and called upon Harry Wynne to appear at that day work at the Marlborough Street Police Court to answer certain charges preferred against him by one William Henry Alexander Butterfield. The charges included fraud, the obtaining of goods by false pretences, and illegal pawing. The reader felt historically criminal even in his own consciousness of innocent intent. The fact of criminality clung like a shadow. Nothing capable of washing it away.

behind the gentleman, gave a start so faint as to be scarcely perceptible, and swinging round upon his heel, walked leisurely homeward. The agreeable smile he wore still lingered, but a very close observer might have noticed a certain gleam of anxious attention in it, as if the smile were strained to keep it there for a moment, or even so much as a look behind him.

face of Vergueil himself, pacing the platform, alert and vigilant. Mr. Morton passed him without a sign, and approached the guides to demand his tickets. Mr. Vergueil was at his elbow, he hoped and thought by hazard. He asked for the ticket instead of an Athenian dandy, with the same easy aristocratic accent, was answered and strolled away. He saw his luggage piled up and he saw that the carriage had been started. The whole world seemed to have moved on in a little while it rumbled past the Seven Towers, and then he breathed freely.

CHAPTER VIII. At the Byzance Hotel in Constantinople there was residing at about this time an English gentleman who was entered on the books of the house as Mr. Ronald Morton.

CHAPTER VIII. He had a tall and slender figure, a little more than five feet high, and he presented to the observer one phenomenon which never failed to attract a momentary attention. He had eyes of a clear blue-grey, and a fair complexion, his hair, which was wavy and of a chestnut color, was parted in the middle and combed down.
