

Polish D.J. Rocks On

If there is one thing for certain about Jan Pawul, the unconventional Disc Jockey from Poland who has become somewhat of an enigma in both his own country and in the West, he likes North American music and radio station T-shirts more than anything else in the world.

Pawul, who was the focus of an article in the Brunswickan a few weeks ago, (November 7, Vol 121, No. 9) replied to a letter that the Brunswickan wrote in response to his initial inquiry to CHSR. Calling himself a "pro-American DJ", Pawul is quickly becoming a Western curiosity as he continues to correspond with various fringe newspapers and radio stations in North America and Europe. Called "The Iron Curtain DJ" by those to whom he has already contacted in the West, Pawul's most recent letter to the Brunswickan has shed a bit more light on his unique and interesting life spinning Western records in Poland.

"I'm a DJ for Clubs and a music writer" he wrote, "but I have troubles (sic) to do my work regularly because I'm too pro-American like the authorities say often to me."

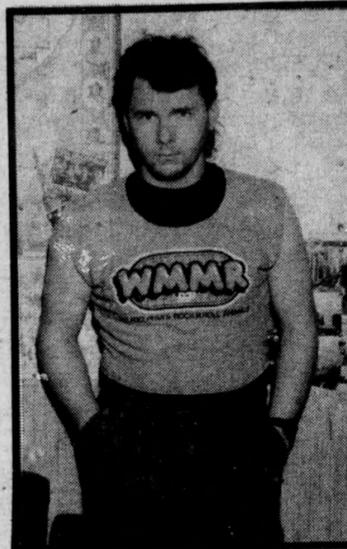

And no wonder, when one considers that the pages of his letter contained within them some rather spicy details about Communist life and his trouble with those in control of the media.

Winston Churchill once called the Eastern Block "the Iron Curtain", and no better words can be used to describe the heavy cloak of governmental control which covers every facet of Pawul's life as a pro-American disc-jockey. "it causes (sic) problems. But I do my best and risk (the) little bit of freedom I have got as (a) person who lives here in Communist area (sic). I'm a little underground, politic (sic) person here (in Poland) - Not famous, but I do my best for my goal."

Combining that goal with a penchant for flashy t-shirts certainly makes Pawul an interesting character. Add to that his attempts to expose Western music in the East Block and its not surprising that he calls himself - "sort of famous". But being famous in Poland by being a thorn in the side of the authorities can get Pawul in hot water sometimes.

That's the chance he takes though and we here in the free world should admire people like him for it. Jan Pawul is definitely not Lech Walesa, but the ideals for which he stands aren't that much different either.

Can you feel it in the air? Can you smell it in the breeze? A small red monster bring the earth to its knees. The time has come to smash this ugly monster on the head. To take the fuel from this fire that someone else had fed. I'll speak now of the bear in red:

That scourge of a bear that aims to kill democracy

And spread the word as far as he can see;

From here to the ends of the earth

And back to you and me;

About how he feels the world should be Asleep under a blanket called the RED SEA

You can help end it and put a stop to them
