Lloyd George and General Palmer both still express their confidence. The heavy nature of the German losses is emphasized by the fact that she has now called another half million men to the colors. Many are wondering when the reserves so much talked of are to get into action. In this regard the military critic of The Buffalo Courier says:

"General Foch will not hit the German attacking force where it expects to receive the thrust, and certainly not where the enemy's forces are best prepared to oppose This is fundamental strategy. Also he will choose for his blow the time when he figures the Germans have extended their active strength to the utmost and have drawn most heavily on their supplies of ammunition and materials for offence; that is, at the time when it will be most difficult to put additional effectiveness into their resistance. This, too, is basic military tactics. General Foch is a master both of strategy and tactics. He will not strike until he is ready—and he will strike where the attack will be the most difficult for the Germans to oppose.

ETWEEN two national stools Shaw falls to the ground. His opinions lose much of their weight by coming from to what nation he belongs, or to whom he will admit his allegiance? He may like to believe that he is a world of nationalities, where even the smallest nation can claim sympathy for its national existence. We may be pardoned, therefore, a natural scepticism towards one whose philosophy by no means embraces the full compass of modern thought, and senseless to attempt to ignore and who would have some difficulty that fact.
