

JUST LIKE A MAN... The patient had a slight cough... He stood like a man...

ROSE OF VENICE; A STORY OF Love, Hatred and Romance.

BY S. CHRISTOPHER.

CHAPTER IV. THE PATRICIAN'S HALL.

As soon as Guido had crossed the threshold, a stately porter accosted him, bowing him, and afterwards following him at a respectful distance in an obsequious manner.

Count Guido Bernardi walked through elegant passages to the foot of the princely staircase. Here another pantomimic compliment took place to another man-servant; and a third and a fourth were repeated before having crossed several superb apartments.

Divans of rich blue damask silk were ranged round the apartment. From the ceiling hung a lighted chandelier of the cut glass for which Venice was and is still famous, which, reflecting in its many devices the several lights it bore, appeared to double and triple the splendour of the room.

As soon as the man-servant announced Count Guido Bernardi, Marco Contoligla rose and, going towards the door, met him, shaking hands cordially with him, and saying: "You favor us late this evening, count, with your welcome company."

At this time Rosa also came forward to receive Guido, the guests had risen, and after the usual commonplace phrases, which all times and countries have considered, and still consider, as good-breeding when a visit is to be paid or received, all returned to their places.

Refusing the offered seat on the divan to the left of his host, on the plea that he would not interrupt the general conversation, Guido took a cushion velvet chair which happened to be near, and placing it between the two small groups which composed the company, sat on it in a very different mood from that in which he had entered.

One of the guests was a venerable and learned friar of the Dominican Order (Father Pio). He was sitting next to Marco Contoligla. The two were talking politics and theology, and discussing the famous question of the differences between the Papal Court and the Republic.

On the corner of the divan opposite the one where she was sitting, with the embroidery of the window, stood the woman, the first of whom he had seen in the morning, the first of whom he had seen in the morning, the first of whom he had seen in the morning.
