Catholics of Means and Parish Work. Catholics and Protestants alike will find much to stir up thought in the following selection from the Milwaukee Catholic Citizen.

Catholics of means have three advantages which will fit them for parish work: (1) Leisure, (2) Money and (3) Higher culture.

Catholics poor in purse are just as good as Catholics in comfortable circumstances; but they are willing to see the leadership in parish good works taken by those who can best afford it in money and time, and who can bring the best intelligence to the task.

We do not find our Catholics of means discharging their proper duty herein except, perhaps in the single matter of contributing money and renting prominent pews.

They are not found actively pushing movements within the Church tending to the moral and material elevation of Catholics.

They do nothing for Catholic libraries or Catholic literature.

They do not promote intelligence and culture among the people by organizing lectures, special training classes or any of the diverse methods of congregational work which ought to suggest themselves.

Socially, they are more snobbish than the wealthy people of any other sect.

It may be true that in this proceeding they are not obliged to associate with badly dressed people inasmuch as the poor are frozen out.

He must be liberal with his time and his work as with his money. He should make it a point forthwith to join one of the parish societies and make himself useful on committees.
