CHAPTER XXVII. "What a romance!" she said. "I never dreamed of anything so charmroll. You may rely on me to do all I can to forward your suit. Why, happiest of women. You may go now, but when shall I tell Kelpie to expect you?" "At nine to-night, if you think she won't be engaged."

"She shan't be," said the lady, and he went his way like one in a dream. Sitting at an upper window, Aubrey watched the young man as he went down the walk to his carriage. How handsome he was, with his soldierly bearing and swift, even, elastic tread.

"He has heard good news. I can tell it by his step and the way he carries his head," the girl said to herself, a smoldering fire in her sombre eves. "She has consented to marry him, no doubt, that pretty little butterfly, with her pink cheeks and shining eyes, who has usurped my place.
