Symbols of Sorrow for the Dead Chieftain.

and within the space this marked off were the numerous floral tributes sent by sorrowing friends from far and near.

The arrangement of the floral trophies was a work that occupied many hours and it was performed with taste. The flowers, beautiful and rare specimens worked with infinite skill into artistic devices—crosses, pillows, shields—formed a continuous bed on the chamber floor. Every passing hour saw an addition made to it.

At the head of the casket on a satin-covered table were placed the late Premier's decorations, the insignia of his various orders. The Premier himself lay in his Privy Councilor's uniform of blue and gold lace, a uniform, by the way, which scarce two dozen persons in the empire are privileged to wear. The garments hung loosely round his worn and attenuated form. His face had a peculiar yellowish color and the surface of the skin was of a waxen consistency, probably the result of embalming. There was no wrinkle or furrow about the mouth or eyes. The features were in perfect repose. As soon as the remains, were placed in state a military watch was appointed to guard them. It consisted of the sergeant's guard of each of the local corps, and during the day and night the guards relieved each other at intervals.

The Governor-General was the first to view the remains after they were placed on the catafalque. He laid on the caket a magnificent wreath of white west and maiden-hair terns, with a card containing the following:

"In Loving Memory."

The floral offerings were almost countless, many of them being elaborate in design, and they came from every section of the Dominion.

A dynamite cartridge was exploded in France, yesterday, and with but brief intervals at meal hours it was incessant. Major Sherwood's directions that only a limited number should be admitted into the chamber at a time were rigorously carried out and perfect order and the state of the late Prince Napoleon, having been denied burial at France, will be deposited in the tomb of the Prince at Superg and the prince at Superg and the Prince at Superg and the number should be admitted into the chamber at a time were rigorously carried out and perfect order and decorum were maintained within the doors. Outside there was a surging, clamoring crowd, in which women largely predominated. It was computed that upwards of 10,000 persons viewed the remains during the day, but many people after waiting for hours, some coming from a distance, went away, unable to gain admittance to the state chamber. At 10 o'clock in the evening the doors were closed, but the people will be allowed to view the remains again to-morrow.

The scene in the chamber at midnight was weird and solemn. The casket was closed, but the presence of death could be felt. Sentries with measured tread paced

The beautiful perfume from the floral offerings filled the chamber and the beauties of the exquisite designs could now be fully appreciated. Nothing could be more suggestive than the wheel representing the helm of State with the captain gone; or the sickle and sheafs, Mr. Laurier's gift. Mr. Chapleau's tribute, the gates ajar, was very artistic.
