dropped, more or less, and then the others -- the French speaking people in other Provinces -- will be more integrated inside the English community?

MINISTER LALONDE: Well, I don't believe that Quebec will ever want to be independent, or separate, from the rest of Canada, But, assuming that what you say is right: You would have, really, one English State and one French State, period!

You know, first of all, there would be no Federal Parliament left, as far as Quebec is concerned, so that if there is one left, it would be only for the other Provinces; and one could not expect the continuation of a Federal bi-lingual system for only the other Provinces. I think this would be completely unrealistic!

I would like to pick up what you said at the beginning, however.

Our policy has never been to provide Federal services in the two languages all over Canada--whether they are French speaking people or not. This policy has been misrepresented and misunderstood by a lot of people in English speaking Canada.

Our policy has always been to, in effect, preserve the right of Canadians -- either English or French -to remain uni-lingual if they wanted to, in the sense that they were entitled to get from their Federal Government, service in their own language from Ottawa, all the time;
