

Dry deposition, an important factor in ecological effects, can not yet be measured on a routine basis. Existing deposition data will be used to evaluate the selected models utilized by the Group throughout its Phase II effort.

Though the long-range transport models do have restrictions on their usefulness, they are an important and possibly the only guide to establishing source receptor relationships. Their further development and intercomparison will be an ongoing activity of the Group in Phase II.