

afterwards were invited to a reception in the home of one of the Christian workers. The chief said there were many ladies and gentlemen present who sang and played on "singing machines" (pianos), and that finally they asked him and Star Blanket to sing. "I thought," said Mistawasis, "I should have sunk into the ground for bashfulness, but I said to Star Blanket that we must sing after all their kindness to us. I told him we would sing the church song the missionary taught us, and so we began, but what do you think? I had scarcely begun when one of the ladies ran to the singing machine and began to play, and all the people joined in the same song, but I was leading the whole band. Now what puzzles me is how these people there knew the same church song we sing away out on the prairie." The explanation the missionary gave, and which greatly delighted the chief, was that God's children are everywhere a singing people, because their hearts are glad, and that the song was the 100th psalm which they had learned in Cree to the
