to put this matter up to Sir Sam Hughes. He believed in public duty, summarized his whole life as evidence on this point. He knows, as any man must who is aware of public opinion and knows what it lives on, that if the deeds of Canadians in arms were properly recorded there would be aroused a popular enthusiasm now noticeably absent.
The imagination of the people has not been considered. Justice has not been done our soldiers in arms.

While in our official despatches mysterious hints are given of the gallantry of certain battalions, although the Canadian people and the families of the soldiers are not permitted to know which ones, it is different in the British cables.
In those one may read any day, as we did yesterday, that among the regiments chiefly engaged were "The Royal Irish Liverpools, London Regiment, Duke of Wellingtons, West Surreys, Northumberland Fusiliers, Grenadier Guards, Gordon Highlanders, Dublin Fusiliers, Field Artillery, East Yorkshires, and Coldstream Guards." These names mean something. The giving of the names accomplishes something.

Why should the Canadian people thousands of miles from the war, be asked to sustain their spirit and enthusiasm when furnished with little else in the way of news from their armies except a naked list of casualties daily?

Why not do away with the idiotic blanks and dashes, the ambiguity, anonymity, and let the splendid deeds of our fighting forces be told in plain words in justification of the casualties, and eight million Canadians will turn from the pursuits that too much absorb them and make, as they should, the war their one supreme interest.

Fred L. Schultz, of Linder, N. J., was one of a battalion of Canadians, who passed through Ramer, Ill., to the border some months ago. He scribbled his name and regiment on a piece of paper, wrapped some handkerchief in it and tossed it out of the window. Miss Emma H.
Kilpner found the handkerchief and corresponded with Schultz. When the mil-lita returned he went to Decatur, saw Miss Kilpner and married her the next day.
