

HOW JOEL PARKS MANAGED HIS DAUGHTER.

One evening Mr. Joel Parks, a wealthy manufacturer in the thriving New England village of Redfield, and Dr. Mill, leading physician of the same place, sat chatting in the Doctor's office. A stranger noting the age and rather prosaic appearance of the two men, would hardly have guessed the topic of conversation. They were discussing the merits of fiction.

'I must have been going on 50 years old when I read my first novel,' Mr. Parks was saying. 'You see a man hereofold, as to speak, has got to stand to business for a good many years, if he expects to get anywhere in particular at last. He does not get much time for light reading, Doctor. But in the last few years I've read a good many, and I enjoy them, especially when they seem true to life, and I think I can generally tell when they are. I like Trollope on that account. I never saw an architect or a duke, but I know as well as I want to that I have just them off to a T. And I like that Howells, if he does hold them such as to be up to ridicule. And let me tell you, Doctor, there is instruction in novels. Those writers have to study human nature. I've got many a hint about managing men from reading those books.'

'Yes,' said the doctor, 'I've read them all my life, and I like them yet—love passages and all. Funny, isn't it? he continued, 'how two old gray heads like you and me will follow the story of a boy and a girl who won't listen to their natural guardians, and sympathize with them every time. We never have any feeling for the sensible fathers and mothers of our own age who are plotted against.'

'I don't know about that,' was the reply. 'I do sometimes sympathize with the old folks, and think that if I had been in their place I should have been more successful in having my own way.'

'Well, Joel,' said the other with a laugh, 'I guess that is one point on which you never get much instruction from story-tellers. Papa and mamma always have their ideas of their daughter's future. The wrong young man happens along, and she develops her ideas quite opposite from theirs. And she always comes out ahead. If you want to carry your point with your offspring, you will have to learn how outside of a story-book.'

'Oh, as to that, perhaps the instruction is all there, only it's instruction how not to do it. I don't suppose that I shall ever need to interfere with my daughter about a husband or a lover; but if I should I am sure that I could learn some thing from the novelists.'

If there were no coincidences, there would be no stories. It was a coincidence that, later on that same evening, Mrs. Joel Parks, an amiable lady, whose mind was in her husband's keeping, said to him:

'Joel, have you ever noticed that Lee Tilton and Annie seem to be taking a notion for each other?'
