Condemns police brutality

BERKELEY

Eldridge Cleaver delivered his first lecture here Oct. 8, in a session closed to the press and general public.

About 300 students attended the class which was described as moderate in tone and content. One listener said the lecture was a "clinical analysis of the causes of racism couched in fairly academic language."

In a reference to bitter argument concerning the consequences of his lectures, the Black Panther leader said "the building is still standing and the sun is still shining."

NEW YORK

The Cox Commission, established to study the Columbia University revolt last spring, lashed out at the university administration and New York police force in its report released Saturday.

The administration, the report said, "conveyed an attitude of authoritarianism and invited mistrust."

Police action was of "excessive force" which "engaged in acts of individual and group brutality causing violence on a harrowing scale," said the commission.

Headed by Archibald Cox, a professor at the Harvard Law School and former U.S. Solicitor General, the commission cited instances of student provocation, but stressed it was "in no way commensurate with the brutality of the police."
