CHAPTER XVII.

GEORGE FALLS IN LOVE, AND UNEXPECTEDLY ENCOUNTERS FRIENDS.

"This is a part of Mr. Garret's property, I suppose," remarked the youth, as his eye travelled up the slope in the direction of Mossgrove.

"No, not exactly; at least, not just yet," answered the man, his face growing sadder than it had yet appeared.

"Oh, your own, is it? I am glad to hear it. I understood the Mossgrove property embraced all this side of the stream."

"So it does, sir; so it does. And, properly speaking, this is a part of it. I am life-rented in the cottage there, and the garden and the bit grass field that ye see."

"When me and Allie goes the way o' all flesh, it will fall into Maister Garret, and I dinna doot that he's wearin' for that day to come."

"Oh, surely not," said George. "The possession of this little place cannot be of such importance to him as to cause him to wish for your decease."

The old man shook his head. "If ye kenned Maister Garret as well as I dae, and the history of this place for the last twenty years, ye would understand the thing better."

"Ah! have you resided here for twenty years?" cried George, in a tone of sudden interest.

"I ha' resided here, or herabouts, for fifty years," replied the other. "My name is Matthew Greigson. I was for twenty years the factor of Argdown—that was afore Mr. Garret cam' and put me out."

"And why should he have put you out?" asked George. "I am certain you were a much better manager of the estate than ever he has been."

"Thank ye, sir, for that guid opinion. Though I will not affect to deny that it is just, I think only of the auld tenants that are alive will say as much."

"I cannot doot," exclaimed George with emphasis. "I have not seen much of Garret, but what I ha' seen—and heard—gives me an unfavourable opinion of him. But since you ha' been in the neighborhood so long, you would know something of the former owner of Mossgrove?"

"Ye mean Maister Bruce?" sighed the old man.

"Ye—yes," faltered George. "Did you know him at all?"

"Did I know him?" cried the old man with singular significance. "Oh, it is to him I am indebted for this place to dwell in as long as I live. Kenneth Bruce, sir, was the noblest and the best man that ever I kenned, and was me he was the maist afflicted and unfortunate."

"I believe so," faltered George, whose interest in the conversation was now, as may be supposed, becoming extreme. "He had to sell Mossgrove, had he not?"

"Alas! and he had, the maist's pity," replied Matthew. "I was his tenant at that time, and if the last penny I had could ha' hindered the sale, I would willingly ha' paid it down."

"Indeed!" exclaimed George, with an eagerness of look and tone which he had not power to suppress. "Were you once the occupant of Mossgrove?"

"I was; and for that, sae, I was indebted to the kindness of Kenneth Bruce. The let ye understand it, sir: when Maister Garret cam' from Jamaica wi' Maister George Morrar's widow, he had a' the poo'r and, of course, he put me out o' the factorship, and stappit in himself."

"What was I tae dae I didna weel ken, for though I had a few bawbees o' my ain, I couldna dae without work o' some kind. Weel, what does Maister Bruce dae but come tae me and ask me tae farm Mossgrove, for he and Mrs Bruce were about tae remove to Edinburgh. Of course I thanked him very heartily for the offer, and went into the place wi' a happy heart. Alas, alas, his misfortunes came very soon after that. He lost his young wife, and in loosing her he lost the very light o' his life. He had nae heart for anything after that, and the effect on him was sae great that he took a shock o' some kind, and lost the power of his right arm. He was fit for nothing a'wa', and he had to sell Mossgrove for support. By this time Maister Garret had married the widow, and wi' her jointure he bought the property. But what dae ye think, sir? Even in his heavy misfortune Kenneth Bruce—bless his kind, noble heart—did not forget me, but made it a condition of the sale that I was to have this cottage and the bit ground as long as me and Allie lived. Now, sir, have I not cause to know and love him?"

George's emotion was too great to enable him to make any reply, and it was not till near the end of a minute that he would sufficiently command himself to say—

"And what became of Kenneth Bruce afterwards?"

"Sir," answered Matthew, in a voice trembling with emotion, "I wad gie maist anything tae ken that; but I dinna, sae maist dae onybody else. He vanished, sir, a' at once—he utterly vanished, and nae maist trace of him could I find, though many and many a time I tried. I wad think he left the country, and went away tae some foreign parts wi' the barne, but whether I am richt or wrang God only ken, for frae that time to this I ha' heard o' him or them. This, sir, has been the great and last sorrow of my life. I ha' kee'it at me myself, for there's naebody here that I could speak of to, and hoo it comes that I ha' telt it to you. I canna understand, for you are a stranger to me, only there's that in your face,

"And why should he have put you out?" asked George. "I am certain you were a much better manager of the estate than ever he has been."

"Thank ye, sir, for that guid opinion. Though I will not affect to deny that it is just, I think only of the auld tenants that are alive will say as much."
