

SELF-RAISED

BY EMMA D. M. SOUTHWORTH

Felix, the lad mentioned in the beginning of this chapter, was scarcely to be called one, upon account of the mental imbecility that confined his usefulness to such simple duties as running little errands from room to room about the house.

So Mr. Brudenell rode off to the post office, and Ishmael walked off to the cottage occupied by Jim Morris.

CHAPTER XI
THE PROFESSOR OF ODD JOBS.
The little house was situated right at the foot of the hill south of Brudenell hall.

Ishmael approached it from behind and walked around to the front. He opened the little wooden gate of the front yard and saw seated in the front door, enjoying that early autumn morning, a stalwart old man whose well marked features and high forehead were set in a rim of hair and heard as white as snow. A most respectable and venerable looking form, indeed, though the raiment that clothed it was old and patched.

But Ishmael had to look again before he could recognize in this reverend personage the Professor of Odd Jobs.

A curiosity to know whether the professor would recognize him induced Ishmael to approach him as a stranger. As he came into the yard, however, Morris arose slowly, and, lifting his old felt hat, bowed courteously to the supposed stranger.

"Your name is Morris, I believe," said Ishmael, by way of opening a conversation.

But at the first word the professor started and gazed at his visitor, exclaiming: "Young Ishmael, Oh, my dear boy, how glad I am to see you once more before I die," burst into tears.
