

some extent the basic theoretical and other differences which are the result of the fact that while the present study is primarily concerned with the general question of the political and economic development of the Latin American countries, the author has also taken into account the specific conditions of each country. It is thus already a part of the study to show that the political and economic development of the Latin American countries is not a uniform process, but that it is a process which is determined by a number of factors, including the geographical position, the historical background, the social structure, and the political system of each country. This is the basic theoretical and other differences which are the result of the fact that while the present study is primarily concerned with the general question of the political and economic development of the Latin American countries, the author has also taken into account the specific conditions of each country. It is thus already a part of the study to show that the political and economic development of the Latin American countries is not a uniform process, but that it is a process which is determined by a number of factors, including the geographical position, the historical background, the social structure, and the political system of each country.