Man Charged With Killing of Angelo Fuca Gave the Detectives a Statement, Declaring He Saw Man Who Had Been Shot Running Along Street, Ran After Him, But Was Held by Firemen and Handed Over to the Police.

Hamilton April 8.—The case of the crown in the John Marango murvaer trial was completed before Chief Justice Rose in the assize court this afternoon, and the defence started. The same story of the shooting which was given at preliminary hearings was repeated by the crown this afternoon and nothing of a new or sensational nature was sprung. Daniel O'Connell acted as crown prosecutor and the prisoner was represented by C. W. Bell and H. M. Yeates, While Marango was being tried in the prisoner's box in the large court room upstairs in the court house, his three children were playing in the corridor below, and their mother stayed with them, awaiting the end of the trial. At times she broke down, and cried, but there was not a soul near to console her, and no one to sympathize with ther.

"I have a statement from the prisoner at police headquarters," said Detective Sayer. "Interpreter Taylor and other detectives were at the station when I interviewed him. I told him, thru Taylor, that he was not obliged to say anything, but if he did it would be used against him."

Boy Overcome.

"Fuca told my father he was going to shoot him in the mouth," said the lad. "I heard some shots," said the boy, and then he broke down and cried. Mr. Bell and Chief Justice Rose effered words of encouragement, and the boy went on with the story. "I saw Campanelli coming across the road and he threw my mother a gun. I asked father what was the the matter, but he didn't answer me." "Angelo said: "Oh, Luigi, you killed me'" sobbed the boy. "Mother told him (father) to go away, the firemen were looking at him and he ran away. I ran after him, and after they caught my father I went to the fire station, where he was."

Did Wilson Oppose Mandate?

The present situation may raise the question of what the records of the council of four at Paris really show. President Wilson had said that he did not agree to the Japanese mandate for the Island of Yap, but others who were represented in the council of four are understood to contend that there are understood to contend that there are records in existence that what objections Mr. Wilson made were in the course of arguments and not expressed in the vote that awarded the mandate.

The positica Japan will take in replying to Mr. Hughes note cannot now be forecast. It has insisted upon its right to control of the island, in correspondence which previously has passed between it and the United States. This correspondence has been published only in fragmentary form, but it has been the understanding that Japan expressed willingness to meet the wishes of the United States, so far as the matter of landing a cable at Yap was concerned, provided such a concersion was not taken to question the right of Japan to administer the affairs of the island under her exclusive handate.
