tion from behind a clock on the mantel, and handed them to the astonished Brinton.

"No, wait a moment," she sald, with steming second thought, "and I will fill the pipe for you."

The sight of the dainty little Puritan filling a pipe—an old blackened pipe at that—was almost too much for Brinton's risbilkities even while the thought that the sweet thing was hiding her repugnance to the weed for his sake brought a lump to his throat.

He opened his lipe to end the comedy by telling her the truth, confident of his reward; but some impish thought impelled him to protong it a moment longer. So he took the pipe as she handed it to him, and held it in his hand, as if about to light it.

"Sweetheart," he sald, "this is perfectly charming of you; but why should I smoke when I know how you hate the smell of tobacco?"

"Oh, but Jack, I don't," she interrupted him; "truly I don't. I used to, it's true, but I don't any more. I—I—oh, Jack; that's the secret; I—oh, how can I tell you! Jack, I—I've learned to smoke!"

As she made the revelation she stood leaning toward him, with her hands clarped tightly in front of her, and her every floer quivered with excitement.

For his part, he stood like a plece of statuary, or, as he afterwards phrased it, like a cigar store Indian, pipe in hand, positively dumb with astonishment. The first recognizable thought that came to him was that his little suprise was mot working cut just as expected. Then he became vaguely consclous that he was expected to say something.

"You have — learned — to smoke."

The finally managed to stammer.

"I shall be if you break me in two with those brutal arms of yours, you great, terrible — darling. But now do believing his eyes meanwhile—were too varied for record. But he had time to regain his composure, and he pulled himself together with an heroic efnave, while I tell you something.

'You are an angel," he declared,

"Wel, you haven't smoked since you left New York yesterday morn-

"Bosh! that's no secret; I knew it before you did. But how did you find it out, you little Pinkerton?"
"If you knew how your beard used to smell you wouldn't need to ask. Uh!"—with a shrug and a grimace—"how I used to hate it! I wonder that I ever learned to like you. But I did, though—anyway, a little," she added, with an arch twinkle of lips and eyebrown that no mortal could have resisted, least of all Brinton; so the dialogue was interrupted again. dialogue was interrupted again.
"Now I shall not tell you the secret at all if you don't behave," she said with mock gravity when she was once more free to talk.

"But you've already told it."

'No, I haven't. I haven't even asked the question that goes before the secret. But I will do that. It's this: You haven't stopped smoking altogether, have yoù, Jack, dearest?"

The question was asked with such eagerness that Jack had to stop to laugh before he answered. Then the mood took him to banter the fair inquisitor, and to hold back his pleasant revelation a little, to get finally the twinking.

"No, I couldn't spare you long enough for that," she said cooingly; "but fortunately it isn't necessary, for here is a pipe that you left last spring, and I got some tobacco for you for fear you wouldn't bring any."

She produced the articles in question from behind a clock on the mantel, and handed them to the astonished Brinton.

man might use toward another, as she handed him the still burning match. Then, in her own voice, "Oh Jack, dear, isn't this perfectly lovely!"

Brinton took two or three long whiffs at his pipe, and blew the smoke out in rings, partly to see if he had forgotten how and partly to steady his nerves and 'gain time. Then he stood holding the pipe in his hand, and looking down into the little Madonna face with the sweet lips puckered to this most unorthodox purpose, and with tobacco smoke wreathed about the head instead of a halo; and the horror he felt at seeing this ethereal creature Branders is singing Tattle Tattle Tale, a catchy wee kid-song. She was perfectly serious now, and the dainty little face, its juility sone, was positively Madonne-like, with the best to make principle and instruction. The best of the title fagure.

"Honest and true, now, dearle, do you?"

"Ho looked at her half quizzleally amiling indulgently.

"But I haven't any pipe or cigar with me," he faltered. "That is," he added hastily. "I haven't any in my pocket, and my satchel is over at the hotel." He felt that it was almost time to spring his surprise, but defayed it for the fullest effect.

"Of course I could go over and get a pipe, if you insist," he added, his eye twinkling.

"No, I couldn't spare you long enough for that," she said coolngly; "but fortunately it isn't necessary, for here is a pipe that you left last spring, and I got some tobacco for you fear you wouldn't bring any."

She produced the articles in question from behind a clock on the mantel, and handed them to the astonished.

"I than't you just a suspicion of what I spoke of the secret, Jack?" she queriel presently. "Most assuredly not," he replied, with the emphasis of supreme truth. "I thought you might have" she said "because once when I was just beginning to learn—let me see, it was just about six months ago—I gave a little hint in one of my letters. Jack, dear, did remember it very clearly. A broad grin spread over his face as the burst out: "Remember it? Well, I should rather say—" then he interrupted himself, and went on hurrledly: "Why, of course I remember it; do I ever forget anything that you write? But I thought you were joking. I never for a minute dreamed that you meant it seriously."

She gave him a beam of pure contentment. "Oh, I hoped you wouldn't," she said roguishly. "I didn't like to do it without telling you, but I hoped you might think it a joke, and so be really and truly surprised when you came."

UNIQUE.

Owing to delay in shipping it is imposible to advertise the feature picture in this issue. We expect it will, however, be a very good one indeed. Two Pathe comedies, entitled Topsy Turvey, and "All On Account of a Uniform," will be included in today's programme, and Mr. Kilcoyne will again sing "The Chink Of The Miser's Gold," which made such a splendid success last evening. Have you heard Mr. Kilcoyne, if not come around and do so at once, as he is making good, to say the least.

HIT AT THE OPERA HOUSE.

For a thirty minute hearty laugh it would be difficult to find anything better than the comedy playlet presented at the Opera House last evening, entitled The Isle of Spice. A company of clever players, for the greater part local, making the most of the ridiculous situations. At the first performance the lack of rehearsal was quite apparent, but the deficiencies were decidedly less marked in the second show, which met with such favor, that much may be expected from the second appearance of the little company tonight.

Messrs. Frank Stanton, Carter Cash, Steve Hurley, and A. McClusky played the leading parts with much acceptance.

A feature of the entertainment last evening was the appearance of Mr. Kilcoyne in a bass solo, entitled "Asleep In the Deep." Mr. Kilcoyne is the new basso at the Unique, and his voice is indeed a remarkable one for its richness, compass and dramatic
