THE PERILOUS SWING;
or,
Tom Burke's Lesson.
OF the Line, the weather, as may be supposed, is too warm for a comfortable reverie or nap in the mere box of a forecastle aboard the whale-ship.
At any time, in fact, the whale's forecastle is not a place in which one can very conveniently build air-castles.
There is an eternal jargon of Spanish, Yankee, Portuguese, Danish, Flemish—or almost every known language—dinging in your ears, all about while the blubber-captain So-and-so, and "My last 'y'age," your sweetest reverie are thus rudely trampled upon, like sandalwood crushed by the heel of a great boot; and as to thinking pleasantly of your lady-love, that is out of the question as the clouds of tobacco-smoke floating around you will give a copper-plate illustration to her skin, in spite of every effort of the fancy.
Little blue-eyed Minnie Wharfield, passenger aboard the whaler Triton, Rio Janeiro, was the sweetest girl I ever saw, either on land or water. Her father, who was with her, had for many years been a sea-captain, but was now on his way to take possession of some property left for him at the place mentioned by a Portuguese relative.
I was at this time about eighteen years old, while Minnie was but fifteen. The silvery music of the girl's laughter, her merry ways, and the merry light dancing in her dark-blue eyes, made upon me a powerful impression whenever I found myself near her. This impression, as it were, was my third cousin, and would keep me to visit him in his cabin.
When away from the girl I would go myself to think of her, usually musing myself in the main-top, or sitting upon the top-sail-yard for that purpose, as I could best to muse on so gentle a subject among my noisy shipmates.
One evening—we were then within a few days' sail of Rio—the wind came on to blow a gale, sending the seas roaring and carrying along with cresting gloaming white, and the phosphorescence shining upon them like showers of stars.
We were standing along with double reefed topsails, foremast, topmast staysail and jib, rolling violently, now and then plunging bows under, when I heard a cry from Minnie, who had come up to look at the scintillating water.
Turning round, I stood at the time near the main-bow, I beheld the girl's hat—a little round one with a green feather—whirling upward toward the main-topgall.
Fascinated, I saw it finally catch against the royal yard, where it remained, the ribbon dangling from it having caught round the rib covered with moist tar, which caused it to stick fast.
Of course the gallantry of the sailors was at once aroused; several of them among the number, sprang for the main-bow, where the captain was in the rigging, however, the captain sang out:
"Hold there—that man is sprung!"
When the gale first struck the ship, I had heard a cracking noise, but had not known whence it came. The skipper, however, had gone aloft to investigate the matter, and came down just before Minnie lost her hat.
There she stood upon the quarter-deck, a pretty picture to look at, her little rosy mouth half open, her hands clasped, her eyes turned toward the fluttering hat, the wind making merry with her long chestnut hair.
"Oh no!" she exclaimed, turning to the captain: "do not let them go if there is any danger."
My companion obeyed the captain's order, returning at once to the deck, but I kept on.
"Tom Burke!" roared the skipper, "come down, I tell you!"
Reluctantly obeyed, although I would much rather have preferred taking my life for the velvet hat with the green feather.
An hour later darkness was upon the sea. The wind still roared a gale, and the seas were as violent as ever.
In calm or rough weather, it was my custom, when in warm latitudes, to sleep either on deck or in the top. In a gale like the present I usually took the precaution to hasten a rope round my middle, if mounted, as usual, into the main-top, and having secured my form with a rope, stretched myself down with my head against the mast.
As may be imagined, I could not sleep, owing to the violent grinding and jerking of the spar. With eyes turned upward into the darkness, I lay musing about Minnie Wharfield and the thought occurred to me that it would be a glorious achievement if I would raise me wonderfully in the late passenger's eyes—if, at the imminent peril of my life, I should procure the hat.
I resolved to try. The captain, who was now below, would be present, knowing nothing about it; and as for the officer of the spar, he would be unable, owing to the intense darkness, to see me go aloft. It struck me that the captain had shown an unwholesome indifference about that hat, because he had not in some way contrived to restore it to the owner, whereas I should have remembered that he was an old seaman, and had good reasons for not making the attempt.

Obeying the impulse of the moment, I darted rapidly up the topmast rigging, gained the topgallant shrouds, and was soon close to the royal yard. At this time every spar in the craft was cracking with the violent motions of the vessel, and as I gained the yard she plunged with a sudden lurch, and I fell almost three hundred feet to my position.
I looked for the hat, and saw it still fluttering from the spar. With a quick movement, I secured it by darting out on the main-top, and was about moving toward the royal yard when I felt the spar cracking, and to my horror, I felt the spar giving way. I threw myself upon the yard, grasping it firmly. I hung me from the spar at the same moment, turning me from my position.
As I fell, my knee came into contact with the end of the topgallant yard, and I endeavored to grasp the spar.
A roll of the ship made me miss it, and I was thrown off.

School Hours.
It would be interesting to know what reasons the School Trustees are prepared to give for changing the hours of attendance at the Public Schools. They are now from 9.30 a. m. to 12.30 p. m., and from 1.30 p. m. to 3.30 p. m. This is as convenient an arrangement as can be made with two daily sessions. It delays the opening of the school to as late an hour as possible, and thus secures a great degree of regularity in attendance. An hour's noon intermission is long enough, and the time between the close of school and dark is valuable to many of the children. This arrangement should not have been disturbed except for the one-session principle, now when the days are growing shorter especially. It will soon be difficult to read without gas at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The best teachers are in favor of so short an intermission for lunch as possible, their experience being that when sufficient time is given at home for children to be employed in household duties, running errands or amusing themselves after their own fashion, their attention is distracted from the exercises of the day, and the number of absentees is greatly increased. The first fruits of the change will probably be a large number of tardy pupils in the mornings, and an increase in the number of absentees afternoons. We believe that the change is not acceptable to either teachers, parents or pupils, and that it has been made without consultation with them or any number of either class. If the sessions of the Board had been open to the public when this arrangement was proposed, there would have been an expression of public opinion against it sufficiently strong to have prevented its adoption. The secret session system enables theoretical gentlemen to ventilate their croch-ets without fear of ridicule or refutation from practical people through the press, and prevents those who sit in judgment from obtaining a true insight into the wishes of the public. Countries of civilization have taught man to perform their day's work and eat their dinner afterward. No man—laborer, mechanic, merchant—wants to spend five hours' work over an entire day by a two hours' cessation from work at noon, and the same truth holds good with regard to school children. We have reason to believe that our views are supported by the experience of the majority of teachers in St. John, and by four-fifths of the school teachers of all urban districts of Europe and America where common schools are in operation. We invite an expression of views from any whose experience qualifies them to speak upon the subject, and if any plausible reason as far as advanced schools are concerned, can be given, let us have it.

Social Changes in England.
The social changes that are taking place in England, as the result of the popular suffrage, trade-unionism, and the abolition of class privileges, are as radical as those which followed the rise of the commercial interest into a power which the feudal lords felt bound to respect.
The Daily Mail Gazette, the Times and the Daily News all of them organs of the upper classes—warn their aristocracies of wealth and birth, that their relative positions, as regards the masses, are rapidly changing. The conclusions of these and other organs of public opinion, as summarized by an exchange, are these: That persons dependent upon fixed incomes must reform expensive habits and practice strict economy hereafter, for the reason that the "strikes" and the coal panic have largely increased the cost of living—that the classes once the poorest are "helping themselves vigorously"—that the trade-unions have enabled the working classes to get into their own hands by far the largest share of political power, and a very large slice of social power as measured by money—that the comparatively poor are safer in the possession of the land than the rich are in the possession of their great wealth—and, as the natural result, that the wealthier members of the nobility have actually ceased to wield political influence, and that the whole question of pauperism and social misery will pass from the hands of the nobles to those of the Government.
The London Journal says, in an issue, who, as one of the London journals says, "will deal with it in a very different spirit from that in which it has hitherto been dealt with"—that is to say, with more direct personal knowledge, but probably with less compassion, and altogether with less sentiment.

186,000 Robbery.
There is excitement among the officials of the United States public store in Green-wich street on account of the mysterious disappearance of six valuable cases of goods containing silk, lace, and velvet worth some $100,000 to $150,000. Five of these cases were examined in the store, with instructions to have them sent to warehouses to await the owner's convenience. They were passed by Day & Clark, the examiners, after which they were given in charge of the delivery clerk to be sent to warehouse. The other case was also passed, and instructions having been received that the owner's cart would call for it, it was sent down stairs, but later on the examining room disappeared with the five other cases.
The owner of the single case, on applying for his goods, could learn nothing about the whereabouts of the case, and he was advised to have a search of the different departments in the store, which was done, but without effect. The officials in charge became anxious to discover the whereabouts of the case, which was the result of a deep lying conspiracy concocted by some one intimately connected with the working of the different departments in the store—perhaps some of the higher officials.
The two delivery clerks, Thomas Kipp and James Taylor, who duty it is to see that all goods passed are sent to their destination, were yesterday suspended under surveillance. Up to last night not the slightest clue had been found.

SMALL-POX EPIDEMIC IN SEAPORT TOWNS.
SAO PAULO, Sept. 24.—Mayor Alvim received by telegraph a communication from J. J. Williams, United States Consul at Santos, in which the writer says that the small-pox prevails in epidemic form at many of the seaport towns on that coast, such as Valparaiso and Panama. The character of the disease, he says, is more pernicious than ordinary small-pox, and much more destructive of life. The letter continues: "In one hospital at Santiago, Chili, out of 28 patients entered in one week, 26 died, and as there are eight or ten hospitals in that city, you can see the magnitude of the pestilence. The disease is making a ray steadily in Callao, which prevails among natives in all the hospitals, and in military camps, giving this disease and yellow fever a greater field to spread over than they otherwise would have." The necessary precautions were taken.

Boats and Shores.
We direct attention to the advertisement of Messrs. J. H. Starr & Co., King Street. This firm keeps always on hand a well-assorted stock of Boots and Shoes, both domestic and imported manufacture, which they dispose of at such reasonable prices as must insure them a very extensive trade.
The sidewalks on Rocky Hill still continue in a state of blockade. When pedestrians are able to pass without having to plough through two or three feet of retreating occupiers, they will be glad to return to their homes.
Ward 3, Portland.
Main Street, Portland, in Ward No. 3, could scarcely be in a worse condition than it is at the present time, the mud from the street is so thickly flowing on to the sidewalks. Some slight allowance may be made on account of the weather we have had this week. The road supervisor, however, is not attending to his duty he is paid liberally for seeing that the streets are kept in good order and it should be done promptly. Ward No. 2 seems to express the whole of his attention at present, and No. 3 is neglected.

The Hon. Col. Gray.
The proceeding in the name of the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec against the Hon. Flora Myers' Theatre.
The Lyceum last evening was crowded on the occasion of the benefit of Marietta Ravel. The play, "Wild Cat, or Marriage by Moonlight," is very sensational and full of thrilling tableaux. Miss Ravel played the role of "Florence Lockwood." Her tightrope performance at the close of the first act was well done and brought down the house. By Messrs. Purcell, Connolly, Hill, Bodworth and Pope she was ably supported throughout the piece. This evening, the last of their short season here, they will play "The Angel of Midnight." Quite a disturbance was created in the vicinity of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon and evening and this morning owing to an attempt of Messrs. Lordly, Howe and Ferguson, who had arranged to take away the metal chairs in the body of the hall, which they claim are not paid for and only rented. A large quantity of the furniture had been removed before Messrs. Christie and Ferguson, who had arranged to take the building for $14,000, learnt what was taking place; they then, under legal advice, went to the Academy and attempted to stop proceedings, on the ground that the furniture was a portion of the building and covered by their mortgage. As the men, under instructions, refused to desist, the assistance of the police was called in, and orders were given that nothing should be taken from the building that night. The men still continued to work steadily, unswerving the chairs from the flooring and piling them in the lobby ready for the first chance. The Christie party having added to their forces with the assistance of the police kept watch on the building all night. This morning, however, the Lordly-Howe party succeeded in getting off two more loads before the arrival of Mr. Christie, who, by advice of Mr. G. R. Purcell, allowed them to carry away the remainder. Messrs. Lordly, Howe and Co. state that the mortgage was executed on the building before the chairs were put in, that the latter were only lent to the Directors on condition that they (Lordly, Howe & Co.) be allowed to take them away providing that the Directors were not able to meet the claims of the mortgagees; therefore there could be no mortgage on them; that it was by permission of the Directors, having received the key from them, that they entered the building. If these facts are true, the facts of the case, Messrs. Christie & Co. committed a bad blunder when they interfered, and it is beyond a doubt that they cannot recover the property again. The disturbance at one time during last evening had every appearance of being a very serious one. The larger portion of the chairs were carried across and up over the stage, through the flies and down the gallery stairs, Christie's men having charge of the main entrance, while the Lordly-Howe men, Messrs. Christie & Co. committed a bad blunder when they interfered, and it is beyond a doubt that they cannot recover the property again.
