ROCKEFELLER MILLIONS TO BE GIVEN TO NEW YORK

A Gigantic Gift of Fifty Millions of Dollars for Charity and Education to the Metropolis—A Close Friend to the Great Standard Oil Magnate Makes the Announcement of the Princely Contribution.

New York, March 17.—The Herald will to-morrow say that, according to a member of John D. Rockefeller, Jr.'s Bible class and who is also a personal friend of John D. Rockefeller and in a position to know of his affairs, the latter proposes soon to make a princely gift to the city of New York. It will amount to at least $50,000,000. It will be partly charitable and partly educational.

In House Of Death

"I did not know that you were unhappy, Lulu," said Mercy practically. "When people talk glibly of death and dying it means they are unhappy."

"I am not unhappy in the sense you mean; but life for me is merely a long endurance with no relief; a long railway line with no station; a long road leading nowhere but back into the jungle."

"I wish I did not know what you mean," said Mercy in a low voice of sympathy feeling that the note was the cry of a hopeless heart. But the Indian girl made no answer.

Early in the morning, Lulu, who had sat buried in thought all the while, roused Mercy, and the latter rose and dressed herself quickly for her expedition.

Now that the time had arrived to start, she seemed to realize far more clearly than before that there was a certain amount of danger in the project, and when she crept quietly down stairs, after kissing Lulu and promising to be back with help of some kind before night, she could not entirely shake herself free from her great nervousness.

The morning light was only dim and faint when she started, and the air was keen, and as she crossed the garden and stepped out into the narrow bleak roadway, she glanced about her in some dread lest the visitors of the night should be lingering near the house.

But she saw no one. As soon as she was well out of sight of the house she stepped out at a quick pace, gathering courage as the distance increased between herself and the house and nothing occurred to alarm her.

The grey thin light of the morning made the desolation of the landscape all the more conspicuous, but after her nervousness had passed, Mercy's thoughts claimed too much attention to let her pay heed to the look of the countryside.

All the way to the station she kept shaking herself free from any signs of that "circle of peril" which the men had drawn round her and Lulu, but she had covered more than half the distance to Pentham before she met any one, and this was only a tramp. She did not like the look of him and kept as far out of his way as possible, holding herself ready to run should he attempt to approach her. But there was no cause for alarm, and he took less notice of her than she of him.

She did not give the matter half as much thought as she would have done at another time, because of the big problems that were pressing for a solution.

The train she caught was slow at first over the branch line, but she changed into the express and soon was flying Londonward, thinking earnestly and with a sense of glad anticipation of the coming meeting with her lover. Every mile that took her farther from the dreary house that was full of ill omen and danger seemed to lift a double load off her heart, because it carried her nearer to Mr. Vyn.

At the great Liverpool Street Station she was a bit confused, because she knew London very slightly, but she had Mr. Musgrave's address and jumping into a cab she told the man to drive her there.

Her fear was that the lawyer might not yet have made his whereabouts known, but she resolved to telegraph to him very fully if it were known.

"Is Mr. Musgrave in?" she asked the lad who was sitting in the outer office.

"No mum, He's away," said the boy, a sharp-eyed youngster who scanned Mercy up and down with quick scrutiny.

"Who is it that I can see?"

"I am, mum, that is, I could take any message. But excuse me, what name?" And have you an appointment?

And he opened an old well-thumbed diary and pretended to search in it for her name.

"I cannot give a message. Take my name—Hawthorne, Miss Hawthorne—not Mrs.—to whoever there is in Mr. Musgrave's office."

"There ain't no one here in his place just at present. But take a seat will you? I'll hold a consultation." He waved Mercy to a chair, and with an air of considerable importance went into an inner room.

think he will be very long, but the worst of chambers is that sometimes one gets kept there such a time. I suppose you have had no experience of that sort of thing? The client was pretty, and the clerk thought a few minutes conversation would be by no means disagreeable. But Mercy had very different intentions.

"Can Mr. Darch be fetched? I must see him immediately. I have come up to town this morning on purpose, and am returning as quickly as possible; and every minute is of the most critical importance."

"I did not know," stammered the clerk. "I'll send for him—no, if you'll excuse me, I'll go over myself, and then, if necessary, I can do what he has gone for, while he comes here."

Five minutes later the senior clerk came in and brought with him the small of clover, suggesting that the business in chambers had not been so urgent as to prevent him getting something, the smell of which was better concealed in business hours.

"The you don't think a telegram would reach him—I mean you can't think of an address where a telegram would find him at once?"

Mr. Darch considered a minute and then shook his head.

"No, indeed I cannot. He may be in Paris today, or perhaps not till tomorrow. If he is longer delayed we shall have a wire from him, giving his address for letters. But that is all."

"I had built upon it so," said Mercy in distressed perplexity.

"Can I not be of assistance?"

"I want Mr. Musgrave at Rochley Court at once. But I had better tell you what is the matter. As briefly as she could, and avoiding as much as possible the inner reasons and facts which she would have told readily to the lawyer himself, she described what she believed to be the imminent danger in which Lulu was placed. But she said nothing of the fears she entertained on her own account from Colonel Roca.

He watched her very closely during the telling of the very strange story, and when he found, as he soon did, that she was keeping back some part of it, he began to doubt the tale altogether. It seemed such a ridiculous thing to happen in these days; and it occurred to him that Mercy, who looked very anxious and scared, had been imagining these troubles, and that it was really a case more for a doctor than a lawyer.

"What does Mrs. Roca say?" he asked.

"She yields entirely to Colonel Roca's decision. He says you have come up."

"No, certainly not—but there are other reasons why I could not tell them. If Mr. Musgrave was here he would know."

"And what do you wish us to do?" was the essentially lawyer-like query. It made Mercy angry.

"I do not wish you to do anything. I want to know what can be done. We cannot stay there and do nothing without running the risk of being murdered in our beds."
