From Harper's Bazar.

Harry Heathcote of Gangoli.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

The two ladies were still watching when the cavalcade arrived, though it was then between three and four in the morning. It was Harry's custom on such occasions to ride up to the little gate close to the veranda and there to hang his bridle till some one should take his horse away, but on this occasion he and the others rode into the yard. Seeing this, Mrs. Heathcote and her sister went through the house, soon learned how things were. Mr. Medlicot, from the mill had come with a bone broken, and it was their duty to nurse him till the doctor could be procured from Maryborough. Now Maryborough was thirty miles distant. Some one must be dispatched at once. Jacko volunteered, but in such a service Jacko was hardly to be trusted. He might fall asleep on his horse, and continue his slumbers on the ground. Mickey and the German both offered; but the men were so beaten by their work that Heathcote did not dare to take their offer.

"I'll tell you what it is, Mary," he said to his wife, "there is nothing for me but to go for Jackson." Jackson was the doctor. "And I can see the police at the same time."

"You sha'n't go, Harry. You are so tired already you can hardly stand this moment."

"Get me some strong coffee - at once. You don't know what that man has done for us. I'll tell you all another time. I owe him more than a ride up to Maryborough. I'll make the men get Yorkie up - Yorkie was a favorite horse he had - while you make the coffee; and I'll lead Colonel - Colonel was another horse, well esteemed at Gangoli. Jackson will come quicker on him than any animal he can get at Maryborough. And so it was arranged, in spite of the wife's tears and entreaties. Harry had his coffee and some food, and started with two horses, for the doctor.

Nature is so good to us that we are sometimes disposed to think we might have dispensed with art. In the bush, where doctors cannot be had, bones will set themselves; and when doctors do come, but come slowly, the broken bones suit themselves to such tardiness. Medlicot was brought in and put to bed. Let the reader not be shocked to hear that Kate Dalry's room was given to him, as being best suited for a sick man's comfort, and the two ladies took it in turn to watch him. Mrs. Heathcote was, of course the first, and remained with him till dawn. Then Kate crept to the door and asked whether she should relieve her sister. Medlicot was asleep, and it was agreed that Kate should remain in the veranda, and look in from time to time and see whether the wounded man required aught at her hands. She looked in very often, and then, at last, he was awake.

"Miss Dalry," he said, "I feel so ashamed of this trouble I've giving."

"Don't speak of it. It is nothing. In the bush every body, of course, does any thing for every body. When the words were spoken she felt that were not as complimentary as would have wished. "You were here come to-day, you know, but we did not think you'd come like this, did we?"

"I don't know why I didn't go home instead of coming here."

"The doctor will reach Gangoli sooner than he could the mill. You are better here, and we will send for Mrs. Medlicot as soon as the men have had a rest. How was it all, Mr. Medlicot? Harry says that there was a fight, and that you came in just at the nick of time, and that but for you all the run would have been burned."

"Not that at all."

"He said no; only he went off so quickly, and was so busy with things, that we hardly understood him. Is it not dreadful that there should be such fighting? And then those horrid fires! You were in the middle of the fire were you not? I waited Kate's feelings that Medlicot should be the hero of this occasion."

"We were fighting them in front to put them out behind."

"And then, while you were away, those men from Brookfield came. O Mr. Medlicot, we were very, very wretched if you were hurt. My sister is so anxious about it."
