in fact it was a native policeman in uniform. His usual behaviour is far from angelic, but if for this once he did God's errand, let, us for this once, at least, call him by a good name. He rescued the baby, bunted up the mother, arrosted her for desertion, and brought fier to Balasore, fote she was confined in the jail, waiting her trial:

The jall is only a few rods from our house, and one day I met the civil surgeon in charge, who asked if 1 would take the baby, as the mother was deternined not to keep it, and it was unjust to the child to let it sufier in her hands.

Before the next morning I had found thloe, one of our poor Christair women, who was to care for the child temporarily, till it was old enough to be put into the mission orphanage. Chloe had two sons, but the daughterashe had always hoped for God had withheld. Wheh the received the litile one into her arms, 7was with a smile as loving and fult of motherly pride as though, instead of peing a diseased, outcast starveling. the child. were beautiful and her own. The arrangement was that the baby should be furnished with all the milk it needed and she paid for its care. In a few months the child looked like a new creacure, and had won a large place in the bearts of its foster parents and brothers.
The father seemed especially fond of her, and you would have thought him the happiest man in India if you bad seen him smile as she ran to meet him with outstretched arms calling "baba, baba" (papa, papa). They named her "Molika," and took great pride in calling her their own baby. When she was old enough to be put into the orphanage there was great sorrow and many tears were shed.

I am always glad-when these litite ones are adopted into good Christian families, for there they get the love of parents which nothing in an orghanage can quite make up to them. But Chloe was so poor I had little idea she would care to add to her burdens. To my surprise some one came, saying, "Missi Baba, they are all crying. They say they want the baby for their Dwn and don't want the pay for its care ; but they know it would suffer without milk, they cannot afford to buy, , and so for the baby's sake it must go."
I understood the difficulty. Milk is very expensive compared with other things, and thus far the monthly allowance for the baby had cost three-quarters as much as all the father's. earnings. I thought 'twould be cruel of me to take her away when they loved her as their own.
l'went to see them. We sat in a circle on the earth floor, and planned for the baby. I saw they were quite in earnest, and so promised to let them keep her and pay for the milk myself till she could tat rice. I made the litule one over to them finally. We all knelt and prayed for God's blessink on parent and child, and I left the family rejoicing as though their baby had been lost and found. The poor mother died in jail before her trial came off, and the foster-mother never asked me for another piece for the baby's carc lest the touch of my money might make the child less her own.-Mis-* sionary fielper.

A penny a week and a prayer,
A tiny gift may be,
But it belps in a wonderful work,
