utility, as security in Southern Africa is largely a domestically driven issue and the roles of defence forces, police services and other state security agencies are not often as clearly delineated as they are in the developed world.