

cannot find employment, and the relief of whose necessities presses so heavily on the interest of the United Kingdom. The company will be able to give immediate employment to able-bodied paupers in the opening of roads, clearing of lands, erecting of houses, mills, &c., it being the want of such immediate employ which proves so distressing to emigrants on their first arrival.

The company will afford every facility and assistance to officers of the military and naval service, and retired officers of the civil service, who, wearied under listless want of occupation, may be desirous to emigrate and settle in the British America for the purpose of increasing, by industry and exertion, their present incomes, and securing to their offspring a comfortable independence.

The company will have competent agents residing in New Brunswick to superintend their affairs, and a sufficient number of commodious and well appointed vessels will be provided to ensure the punctual fulfilment of all their engagements. A medical officer will accompany each vessel, and attend the emigrants until settled upon the lands to be assigned to them.

Under these circumstances, while the company can confidently hold out to the capitalist a secure and advantageous return for his investment, they can also justly claim the co-operation of the patriotic and humane, from the conviction that, by the aid of this company, parishes now burdened by a superabundant population may be relieved speedily and economically, and at the same time settlements essential to the British will be rising up to the north of the United States, calculated to be of important service to Great Britain in her political and commercial relations.

Another important advantage resulting to the public will be that of affording correct information to persons desirous of emigrating, thereby preventing the calamities which those invariably experience who are inveigled by a class of men who exist by plundering the unwary, and inducing them to emigrate in ill appointed and crowded ships, merely for the gains of passage-money, and whose frauds are not detected till it is too late to obtain redress.
