SIMPLE TALE OF TRAGIC CONTEST

Lamentable Stand by Wells Against Carpentier as Told by London Paper.

English papers just to hand tell of the lamentable stand made by Bombardier Wells against the Frenchman, Georges Carpentier, on Dec. 7, at the National Sporting Club. Interest in the match was remarkable. The bout was for a £5,000 purse and a side bet of $5000. The house was packed with a noteworthy assemblage that included the Prince of Wales. Lord Lonsdale was active in behalf of Wells. The following is from Sporting Life of London:

It is a simple tale, that tragic contest between Carpentier and Wells. Carpentier won in one minute thirteen seconds, or in less than half a round. Wells never from the outset looked a winner. He appeared excited when he entered the ring. Carpentier at once rushed towards Wells, and got in blow after blow on the body.

Wells attempted to retaliate, but failed. The Frenchman returned to the attack, and after landing right and left blows to the jaw hit Wells again on the body, and the English champion fell and failed to rise before the count.

Extraordinary scenes followed the result, both in the club and in the street. Very few important contests have ended so quickly. The Brevmas stopped bout for a heavyweight championship was, we believe, between Tom Sharkey and Jem Roche, on March 17, 1903. Burns won in 1 minute 23 seconds.

How it All Happened.

But none could have guessed, certainly no one could have thought, that it would be all over in less than half a round.

Let me tell you how this tragedy came about. It was almost exactly ten minutes past ten o'clock when Wells and Carpentier faced each other.

The packed house, that a moment before had prattled, was hushed into silence as Carpentier, like a greyhound, bounded at Wells, cleverly covering up, as is his wont. The leap, for leap it was which Carpentier made at Wells, was so swift, so impudently daring, because it denoted his colossal confidence, that it seemed to stagger Wells. And in a flash Carpentier was into the Englishman's body with all his might. Biff! biff! biff! went Carpentier, and Wells winced. He did not know what to do. As I have said, he was as one paralyzed. He shivered.

We looked on, open-mouthed; it was all so incredible.

There was just a flickering hope for the Englishman when he landed on Carpentier's right eye and made it pink. But almost at the same time Carpentier had cut the bridge of the Bombardier's nose, and blood sort of spurted. And there were ominous red patches in the region of Wells' ribs.

And we feared the worst. For now, even when the contest was a few seconds old, Wells was in a bad way.

The French visitors screamed with delight. "Carpentier! Carpentier!" they shrieked.

The calls of "Silence!" were unavailing.

And on went Carpentier like a demon, like a man possessed.

Biff! ping! his blows seemed to ring out.

The Bombardier was in a terrible way.

And then came the end.

Carpentier landed with right and left, and as quick as lightning, to each side of the Bombardier's face.

The whole frame of Wells quivered.

And Wells, leaving himself open, Carpentier hit him with left, right, and left again to the body.

Down went Wells with a bang, on one knee.

"Oh!" everybody shouted. For everybody was thunderstruck, flabbergasted.

And Wells—it hurtist to write it—rolled over almost on his back.

And we knew that he was a beaten man.

One, two, three, and on, called Mr. Zerega, the timekeeper, until the fatal ten.

Wells lay on the floor of the ring; there was no attempt to rise.

And then it was all over.

And then shouts of joy from the French visitors.

Remarkable Scenes.

Descamps, the most amazing of managers, jumped up as if on springs in the centre of the ring. He flew at Carpentier, hugged him, and caressed him, and in a trice the French champion was shouldered.

And Carpentier blew kisses to everybody; he suffered to be mobbed. He laughed and pinched himself, as if it was all unreal.

For the first time since I have known Carpentier he was excited; excited even to the point of breaking down.

And in his excitement Carpentier for the moment forgot his opponent. But he managed to shake himself free from his jubilant, over-wrought, madly-excited countrymen. And then, like the good sportsman, and with that charming grace that is his, he went to Wells, who by this time had been carried to and seated in his corner, and was having his face sponged, and took him by the hand.

There was a look of pain on Carpentier's face.

There was a look of pain on every Englishman's face.

And round the ring Englishmen stood as if possessed.

A contest for a record purse over in less than half a round! And a great big Englishman beaten by a boy!

It cut deep, and the cut smarted.

Wells was splashed with water; his ears were pulled and twisted, so that he came to.

And then with a sickly smile he stood up.

Jim Driscoll was by his corner; he spoke to the Englishman in an excited, jerky, even a mad way.

One could guess what he said. It must have been awful for Wells to hear.

But Wells smiled good-naturedly. And then Lord Lonsdale came over to Driscoll and coaxed and cajoled him.

For no words mattered.

And then we left the club, trying to forget it all.

And the Englishman, now outside the ring, and with great big tears in his eyes, bent under the ropes, and with right hand uplifted made a pathetic appeal to be heard.

And then we left the club, trying to forget it all.
